Readership program gains popularity

Students can see tuition dollars at work

Enhancing K-State

Students will be asked to consider what services they want to see continue with next year's tuition increase. Five percent of tuition revenue is designated for student-centered enhancements, which are recommended by the Student Senate academic affairs and executive committees and approved by university administration.

Although the Collegiate Readership Program is gaining popularity, it remains to be seen whether the majority of the student body is taking advantage of the service.

Student Body President John O'Hara said the readership program is funded with $150,000 of tuition revenue designated for student-centered enhancements.

The New York Times, USA Today, Manhattan Mercury, Topeka Capital-Journal and Kansas City Star are available for students in 15 locations around campus with the swipe of their K-State ID.

"The response from students has been very positive, and I would anticipate it would continue," O'Hara said.

The program is administered by USA Today and aims to encourage skills important for educated citizenship and develop a readership habit. The newspaper distribution is connected to a program encouraging the integration of newspapers in the classroom.

In a pilot program last year, newspapers were distributed for three weeks to get a feel for how students would respond.

According to USA Today's survey results, K-State students picked up an average of 2,541 newspapers per day. Ninety percent of students surveyed said they would support a fee to continue the program.

The program was up and running when students arrived on campus this fall. O'Hara said he is looking to add more locations for students to pick up the paper, which would be no extra cost to the university, but it has been difficult to find locations that are in accordance with fire codes.

"We'd be open to new locations. We still have to meet fire codes," he said. "We try to do our best to spread them across campus."

The program is flexible enough that K-State decides how many papers are delivered to each building, O'Hara said. The university is only charged for the newspapers that are taken from the bin, not the number delivered.

"We're not charged unless the papers are actually taken," O'Hara said. "We are charged on a per-paper basis. We've set a cap that it cannot exceed

K-State lacks policy prohibiting teacher-student relationships

She walked into a classroom with an unclear idea of why she is taking this elective. She found a seat, said hi to students sitting around, and took out her notebook.

He walked into a classroom with a slight feeling of indefiniteness of whom he is going to teach. He stopped at the front of the room, greeted the class, and passed out the syllabus.

Two years later they seem to be happily married in spite of propagating rumors and scowling looks that their relationship, which reportedly started after a final, prompted within the university circles.

Consensual relationships between students and faculty members are not a popular topic among the university officials, even though there are quite a few cases when K-State professors dated and sometimes married their former students, such as the one mentioned earlier.

Unlike many other universities across the country, K-State does not have any formal policy discouraging students and educators from engaging in such activities.

"K-State does not have a policy that prohibits faculty or graduate assistants from dating students. However, it would be discouraged and considered a conflict of interest within normal professional standards," Jane Rowlett, director of academic services, said.

"Should a relationship develop, we would expect the faculty member to disclose such a relationship so it could be managed in a way that would protect the learning environment for all the students in the class and ensure objectivity and fairness in the evaluation of the student's academic performance."

Rowlett said a policy prohibiting relationships would be difficult to enforce.

"We can not tell people whom they should be friends with," Rowlett said.

Stephen White, dean of the College of Art and Sciences, said the college has had some cases of consensual relationships between students and faculty members in the past.

White said the administration would normally try to avoid the conflict of interest by reassigning a student to another section or making another faculty member oversee a student's grades.

"Apart from that, however, there is no appropriate action that we could take because of the lack of the university policy," White said.

In the mid 1990s, many universities amended policies on consensual relationships to faculty handbooks. With the exception of K-State, the University of Missouri and Baylor University, all other institutions in the Big 12 Conference have a written statement addressing amorous relationships.

In the University of Kansas policy, amended in 1994, romantic or sexual relationships between persons of unequal professional power are called unwise and often contrary to pr sional ethics.

The important implicatior policy is that an individual thority position bears the p sponsibility for any negati quences resulting from apparent consensual relati other words, if the relatio ed and one of the parties b charge of sexual harassme sumption would be that p in authority imposed themselves.

Yar Ebadi, dean of College of Business Administration, said he was unsure about the effectiveness of such policies, especially with regard to the ability to enforce.

He said even in the absence of a

Car bomb kills at least 4 in Fallujah; violence in Iraq continues to escalate

U.S. soldier killed in Baghdad grenade attack

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – A car bomb exploded Tuesday west of Baghdad, killing at least four people a day after three dozen people died in a wave of suicide bombings in the Iraqi capital. U.S. officials said one of Baghdad's three deputy mayors was killed in a hit-and-run shooting.

The latest attacks, including the killing Sunday of Deputy Mayor Faris Abdul Razzaq al-Assam, raised fears that a strengthened insurgency is increasingly targeting Iraqis who work with the U.S.-led coalition as well as international groups that had considered themselves at less risk than U.S. soldiers.

Despite the escalation in attacks on Iraqis, American forces remained targets, with insurgents firing on a U.S. military base and convoy in two northern cities Tuesday.

In Baghdad, a rocket-propelled grenade attack killed one U.S. soldier and wounded six others while they were trying to destroy roadside bombs, the U.S. military said Tuesday.

The soldiers, from the 1st Armored Division, were attacked Monday, the same day a team of suicide car bombers devastated the Red Cross headquarters and three police stations, killing three dozen people and wounding more than 200.

In Tikrit, Saddam Hussein's hometown, insurgents opened fire late Tuesday on the southern gate of the main U.S. military base, wounding at least one American soldier from the 4th Infantry Division, witnesses said. A patrol was sent out to search for the assailants, who soldiers said apparently fired

WILDCATS CELEBRATE DO-OVER NATIONAL CHAMPIONSHIP

K-State fans throughout the fifth floor of Putnam Hall rejoiced as Cody Bensen, freshman in open-option, led the Wildcats to a 15-0 record and secured the national championship in NCAA Football 2004 for the PlayStation 2.

"Cody is the ultimate master at this game," Matthew Hardenbrook, senior in biology, said. "It's like the ultimate vindication for our real football team."

Bensen explained he had three secrets for success.

"First, I set it to Junior Varsity difficulty. I mean, don't get me wrong, I can whup anyone at Heisman level, but I thought this would be a more accurate simulation of how we should have kicked the crap out of everybody.

"Second, I turned off injuries. That stinkin' McNeese State player that injured Roberson screwed us big-time, dude.

"Finally, I created Terry Pierce, basing his stats off of last year's version plus an off season in Dynasty Mode. With Pierce, the Lynch Mob is unstoppable."

Bensen had a hard time nailing down his favorite moment of the dream season.

"Geez, dude, it's probably gotta be a toss-up between crushing Texas 56-7 on their home turf and flattening OU in the Big 12 Championship Game 63-14. And, of course, you can't forget the final and most important win, that 49-3 demolition of Miami in the Sugar Bowl. Man, talk about rolling on all cylinders."

Fast facts

Highlights of season

- Bensen's team outscored opponents by an amazing 805-51 margin on their dominating journey to the Big Easy. In the process, they broke nearly every standing NCAA record.
- Bensen's favorite plays? "Option Pass out of the Ace-Slot is a staple. Toss in some HB runs, some Triple Option and a little play-action, and you're gravy."

By Melissa Haug
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wonder Workshop Children's Museum is getting tons of screams from adults and children this Halloween.

The Wonder Workshop, which is an interactive museum for youth and their parents, will be sponsoring its fourth-annual haunted house this week.

Money made from this year's haunted house will go toward scholarships and outreach programs that provide workshops for such things as science, history, storytelling and music.

"The haunted house is our only fund-raiser and has done well in the past. We usually give about $20,000 in scholarships a year," Richard Pitts, founder of Wonder Workshop, said.

The idea for the haunted house came from Pitts' longtime friend, Paul Gates. In the past Gates has been responsible for running a haunted house for the Manhattan Jaycees.

After being asked by Pitts for fund-raising ideas, Gates suggested a haunted house.

"The money goes to a good cause, and I enjoy being a part of it," Gates said. "Last year, Halloween was a long day for the volunteers that helped run the house. We were open until 12:40 a.m.

"After having some college students tell me that our haunted house was the scariest they'd ever been to made me feel that all the hard work was worth it."

Pitts said he and about 20 K-State and community volunteers have been busy preparing the house since the beginning of October.

"I tip my hat to the mixture of ages that have volunteered their time in making this haunted house happen another year," Pitts said.

City-logo contest deadline approaching

By Lacey Storer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's getting late, but there's still time to enter a design into the Celebrate 150 Logo Contest.

The contest, which began in August and will end Friday, is in honor of Riley County's and Manhattan's 150th birthdays in 2005. The contest calls for community members to submit design ideas for a logo that would represent the sesquicentennial.

"The goal is to come up with a brand for the Celebrate 150 that would incorporate the 150th of what Riley County and Manhattan are and all their history," said Allie Lousch, administrative program coordinator for the city of Manhattan and a Celebrate 150 volunteer.

She said the logo will be used extensively and will be a recognizable symbol.

"Think of all the places you see Willie the Wildcat," she said, "that is what we have in mind."

Angie Reed, publicity chair for Celebrate 150, said the logo will appear on the Celebrate 150 Web site, letterheads, banners, signs and other memorabilia.

"Everything we print will have this logo," she said. "It will basically be the focal point for the sesquicentennial."

The contest is open to people from Riley County and the Manhattan area. Logo designs entered into the contest must be original artwork and might not have any licensed or registered designs – such as Willie the Wildcat – incorporated into it. Winners will be chosen by the Celebrate 150 publicity committee.

Though the contest is almost over, there have been a surprisingly low number of entries.

Reed said she was shocked that no graphic design students had entered the contest.

"This would be a really good opportunity for a graphic student," she said. "If they won, it would be a published piece."

Lousch said the logo would be a good résumé-builder for design students, and it would give them a chance to show off their skills and see their artwork all over the city of Manhattan.

There's not much time left, but Lousch said she still wants people to enter design ideas.

"Great work can be done in a short amount of time," Lousch said. "I wholeheartedly encourage people to get involved and be creative and have fun with it."

- Entry forms can be received at www.celebrate150.org, under logo contest or at www.ci.manhattan.ks.us under Celebrate 150.

Automated machines reject new $20 bill

By Roxana Hegeman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA – As colorful new $20 bills circulate around the nation, more consumers are finding out that the notes do not work on automated payment machines like those found in self-service checkout counters at grocery stores.

The first calls started coming into the U.S. Treasury Department's Bureau of Engraving and Printing two days ago, frustrating government officials who had worked to overcome the vending machine problems that followed the 1998 redesign of the bill.

This time the problem seems to plague mostly automated payment machines – a relatively recent arrival in the industry, the bureau said.

"We learned from our lack of outreach last time, and we really made an effort to reach out to thousands of business industries and associations so they can start working with their customers and members," said Dawn Haley, spokeswoman for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

After the problems following the 1998 redesign, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing wanted to make sure its latest version was technology friendly.

So more than a year before the new bills were put into circulation, the bureau reached out to the vending machine industry, transit authorities and the gambling industry to help them get ready for the new bills, Haley said.

But nobody thought about the automated payment machines until the first calls started coming in to the bureau.

A sign on the automated checkouts at Dillon grocery stores now advises customers to trade their new $20 bills for older bills before using the machines.

TO THE POINT

Student-teacher boundaries need definition

There is no reason for the absence of a formal policy prohibiting instructor-student relationships at K-State.

If it is implied that professors should not have amorous relationships with students – why not put it in writing?

A formal policy would make K-State less vulnerable to possible lawsuits over environmental sexual harassment and harboring potentially dangerous behavior.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

It would also protect students, as their instructors would have a formal rule to obey, instead just an ethical inclination.

It might be true that it would be difficult to monitor and enforce a formal policy, however, that hasn't stopped all but two other Big 12 Conference schools from putting a written policy in their faculty handbooks.

The Office of Affirmative Action at K-State has verified that students have brought sexual harassment complaints against professors in more than one instance.

It should only take one case of a student feeling harassed by a faculty member to spur officials to action.

What's the limit on how many students can be harassed before there is policy that allows K-State to take action of a greater consequence?

Passionate opinions

Criticism of Gibson's film about Christ unnecessary

Hype is a necessity in Hollywood today. Films float or flop based on it, but – contrary to popular belief – it is not always positive.

CHRIS HARROP

The millions of increased revenues brought by hype might not outweigh the religious controversy brewing over "The Passion of Christ," the hotly-debated film about the last hours of Jesus Christ.

Any film concerning this delicate subject matter is bound to raise eyebrows. Martin Scorsese's "The Last Temptation of Christ" was banned in a number of theaters. That attention is amplified by the fact that Mel Gibson, one of today's most popular actor-directors, is at the helm of the project.

A host of organizations, most prominent among them the Anti-Defamation League, have criticized the production following reviews of the script or screenings of unfinished prints.

The most even-handed responses, like the one offered by Rabbi Mark Levin in the Kansas City Jewish Chronicle, express concern over the film's potential to incite anti-Semitic thoughts and actions.

Some of the more critical concerns with "The Passion" make note of Gibson's religious views. His aversion to the Vatican II reforms of the 1960s is used to characterize him and like-minded Catholics as ultra-conservative, anti-Semitic hatemongers.

The majority of the articles, columns, news blurbs and other media pieces dedicated to the film are not created by individuals with any firsthand knowledge of the film. So much is said with so little known about the realities of this film and the motivations and intentions of its crew and producers.

What can be said without that authoritative understanding of "The Passion" is this: Art should not be condemned when its intent and meaning are lost to justify the beliefs and actions of radicals.

"The Passion" is akin – in its namesake, no less – to the passion plays that mean to inspire faithful Christians to better understand the suffering of Christ and the grace of God.

Does that warrant the demonization of Gibson and his production crew for creating a film that anti-Semitics erroneously use to launch attacks against Jews today?

The issue is intent. Gibson, the cast of "The Passion" and many crew members have made light of the controversy in recent months while talking to the news media.

Other critics are quick to note the issue of historical accuracy in the film. Those who have seen the widely-circulated trailer or the film itself have reservations concerning Gibson's presentation of Christ's last hours. These people should take a course in logic before they take another religious history class.

The history of Christ is muddled at best. While we have the Gospels and other accounts, there is no empirical evidence concerning the minute details of Christ's existence.

What we do have are the accounts of the disciples, which you can either accept or reject depending on your religious views.

Ultimately, "The Passion of Christ" is a work of cinema. It is meant to entertain, inform and hopefully enlighten. What each person takes to heart and mind from a piece of cinematic art will always differ.

Showcasing intelligence wastes others' money

Political science classes suck.

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

It isn't the professors or the material that causes me to detest politics classes.

It is the students.

Every Tuesday and Thursday at 11:05 a.m. in Denison Hall, Jeffrey Pickering faces a classroom of more than 100 students.

A typical class period begins with bad jokes about Missouri football being good. Next, the students focus their attention on a lecture outline on the overhead projector.

With a pen clenched in my hand I prepare to learn. Pickering begins lecture and uses the Iraq war as an example of total war.

A hand flies into the air and Pickering prepares to answer a legitimate question about total war.

Unfortunately, Loudmouth Intellectual Susie has no intentions of asking a question about total war. No, she is going to force an entire class to swallow her worthless opinions.

After yakking on for five minutes about Iraq being a war for oil, she attacks Pickering's lesson, despite the fact that he has a doctorate and has spent years studying this topic.

Lamentably, she also missed the entire point of the lecture and the professor is forced to reiterate the facts for another 15 minutes.

I want my 20 minutes of class time back. I paid for those 20 minutes of lecture and some hotshot just stole them from me to show off her political savvy.

World Politics is not a current events class or a political thought class. The tests are multiple choice and the lectures are based on theories and facts gathered by political scientists.

Students who are falling into debt while observing tuition rise do not have time to listen to elitist students spout their opinions.

Witty students should save their opinions for in-depth, upper-level courses, or maybe write a letter to the editor if they care so much, but please, let other students learn.

If the professor was spouting his own political views about war or presidential candidates, students would have a right to contest his opinions. However, the professor is not gushing his political preferences because he is doing his best to present the material objectively.

There is a class to be taught and he knows we don't have time to discuss the failings or attributes of George W.

If a professor tries to push their political opinions upon students, by all means, throw your hand in the air, but if you are angry or want to show off – don't use classes I paid for as your platform.

Osborn draws on myths, does not support claims attacking abortion

Editor,

I was extremely dismayed after reading Tammy Jo Osborn's column on the so-called "partial birth" abortion on Friday.

Rather than taking a journalistically mature approach to this subject, she relied only upon empty rhetoric and clichéd stories to applaud the ban as "a return to our humanity."

My greatest frustration with this article is her lack of evidence to support her own opinions. For instance, she writes how she has seen "the hurt that comes from choosing an abortion and the pain that seems to haunt the decision."

She perpetuates the myth that women who choose an abortion lead guilt-ridden and unhappy lives.

Scrupulous research that includes diverse samples, different measures of responses and different times of assessment culminates in a resounding negation of this myth.

Additionally, I have yet to see insurance companies peddling life insurance to pregnant women for their fetuses. Admittedly, the joining of an egg and sperm cell has the potential to form a baby – but often, it does not result in a baby.

However, it is precisely the potential for life that Osborn equates with life itself. Following along with her logic, my eggs have the potential to form a life. Should I have a funeral every time I have my monthly period? A sperm cell has the potential to form a life.

So is masturbation mass murder?

Osborn fails to examine the serious ramifications of this piece of legislation. This ban is an erosion of Roe v. Wade and seeks to criminalize safe abortion procedures even before fetal viability. The wording of this ban provides no exceptions for victims of rape or incest.

Furthermore, it fails to include a provision addressing the health of the mother. The American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists opposes this ban, stating that such an intervention by the legislative bodies is "inappropriate, ill-advised and dangerous."

Is this the humanity that Osborn applauds – the humanity that values the rights of fetuses over the rights of living women, the humanity that ignores the victims of sexual violence, the humanity that seeks to destroy a woman's control over her own body and her own right to choose?

College lessons

Life in college resembles 'Animal House' but also schools students on survival of real world

GRANT REICHERT

Ha, I made it to college!

Take that, high school counselor. You said it would be a waste of my money if I went to college, but I showed you – I got my parents to pay for it.

I am now watching television in exotic settings, experimenting with mind-altering Manhattan city water and basically just living out an alternate version of "Animal House," this time starring Bob Saget. It's a blast in the same way that being blown up by a hand grenade is.

OK, it's not that bad. College is better than high school in the same way that winning the lottery is better than getting a chronic wasting disease.

There's blaring hip-hop music at 2:30 in the morning, a pipe above your bed that leaks strange colored water on your face – I would say it's about the color of tuberculosis, actually – and being on a floor where the favored pastime is finding creative places to vomit.

We've had two floor meetings where vomit was the sole item on the agenda, and still no one has hit the toilet, vomit or otherwise.

If you ever see a high schooler who is dejected because he doesn't think he's college material, just tell him if he works hard enough, he can learn to drink more.

At home, I had this magic container that I could throw my laundry in to have it instantly cleaned and folded. Now, I have to spend hours meticulously shrinking my shirts, trying to achieve that impossible goal of Downy Freshness. Those laundry commercials give young people unhealthy, unrealistic goals to aspire to.

But college is not all bad. As a freshman I have to just try to be open-minded and experimental, but not in the look-what-happens-when-I-mix-these-common-household-chemicals way.

Actually, I have invented a new gourmet residence hall recipe. Three out of four taste-testers agree it's not that fatal – I couldn't get a response out of the fourth guy either way.

This recipe even helped me beat the Freshman 15. It was no contest – I beat it by like 20 pounds.

First there are the greeks, who prove drunkenness isn't so much a disease as it is a housing option. Then there are the dorm rats, who have very little in common with real rats besides the fact that they're both disgusting vermin.

There are many other interesting stereotypes – I would make fun of some ethnic groups here, but then I would be called a racist.

I've always known exactly what I wanted to do with my life, so the first thing I did when I got here was enroll in open-option. I am staying in it as long as humanly possible. Plus, if I graduate in open-option I will have no discernible skills – perfect for a job in secondary education.

That's right, "if" I graduate. I have watched enough college documentaries – was "Revenge of the Nerds" by Ken Burns? – to know it will be difficult.

Still, with a little hard work, integrity and perseverance – and a chance to grade my own papers – it'll be downright not unpossible.

That's a better chance than my counselor gave me.

Christian opinions clash with sheer open-mindedness

Editor,

I'm writing in response to the Oct. 27 letter "Christian right is appalling" by Sarah Hupp.

Hupp seems to be strongly against Christians forcing their opinions on society, but what she's written in her argument also is forcing her opinion on the Christians.

She seems to think Christians should be more tolerant of different ideas. She mentions Jesus' message being one of love and respect, which it was, but his biggest message was one that was very narrow-minded.

"I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me," Jesus said in John 14:6.

It's odd how quickly people will stand by Jesus when he is speaking of love and respect, and then quickly jump away when he claims to be the Savior.

Collegian's letter selection gives skewed view of Christians

Editor,

I consider myself a somewhat laid-back individual. I eschew getting into discussions regarding beliefs. Quite frankly, I think people have the right to believe what they want to believe within reason.

However, in the past week, the Collegian's published material has repeatedly bashed Christians and Catholics alike. The Collegian seems to forget there are many, many religious people out there who are rational, level-headed people.

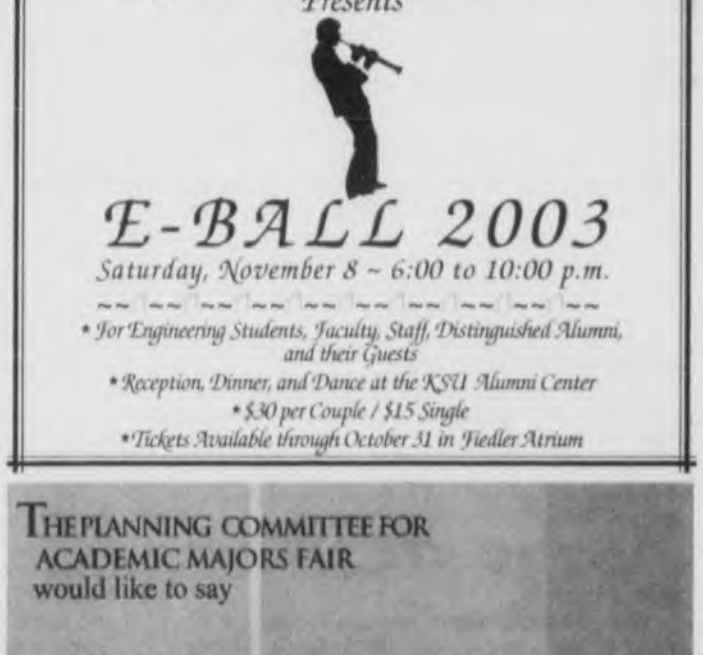
I refer to the overly angry and half-researched letters by Sara Hupp and Jennifer Elsbury. As a practicing Catholic, I will be the first to tell you people like Elsbury give all Christians a bad name.

I have lived in four states in my life, and never once have I met a bishop or priest who speaks so eloquently against homosexuality as Elsbury. These ministers realize there are more important things to devote their time to.

This, believe it or not, is the general stance of the Catholic Church at the moment. No, they don't think homosexuality is "right," but there are other things to do.

Hupp appears to think that the few are the same as the whole and makes wide, sweeping stereotypes about all Christians that I find both false and ignorant.

This said, I find the Christian-bashing going on in the Collegian below its caliber. The entire thing is a hairbreadth from bashing blacks or Hispanics or Asians or fat people, and I feel quite certain the Collegian would not publish such garbage.



I fail to understand why the Collegian has made an exception in the case of Christians.

K-State cracks down on counterfeit football tickets

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will increase security and supervision at Wildcat football games after several counterfeit tickets were uncovered last Saturday, Director of Athletics Tim Weiser announced Wednesday.

The tickets were confiscated mainly in premium seating sections of KSU Stadium, but ushers have been advised to pay closer attention at all ticket locations.

"This is an issue we take very seriously," Weiser said in a prepared statement. "Any person utilizing counterfeit tickets will be immediately ejected from the stadium and face additional consequences."

Those consequences, Weiser said, could include loss of season-ticket privileges and legal prosecution.

"We have an obligation to our fans who have paid for their tickets," Weiser said. "We ask our fans to help monitor and come forward with any knowledge of bogus ticket activity of which they may be aware."

Weiser also maintained the solicitation or scalping of tickets on K-State property is prohibited, and violators will be removed from the premises.

EDMONDS ON

Defensive end Scott Edmonds has begun making a push for playing time, moving into the two-deep behind incumbent Andrew Shull.

Edmonds, a 6-foot-4, 255 pound sophomore from Kansas City had three tackles in the Wildcats' 42-6 win over Kansas, two of which were sacks that resulted in a net loss of 15 yards.

"He's playing consistently well," Coach Bill Snyder said. "He plays hard. He's got good quickness and runs as good as any defensive end we have."

Edmonds caught the eyes of Snyder and other coaches in fall drills, and has been making steady improvement since.

"I don't think he ever did anything before that would get me jumping up and down," Snyder said, "but he's become a much more complete player. He's really stepped it up."

Area provides many prime fishing locations

Cooler weather arrives and time is running out to hit the water

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Though winter is knocking on the door, there is still time for outdoorsy men and women to enjoy the many fishing options in the area.

In nearby Milford and Tuttle Creek reservoirs, K-State students are a short drive away from the state's two largest bodies of water.

Although Milford and Tuttle Creek provide two challenging options for students who love fishing, there are other smaller bodies of water fulfilling the craving of those who love the sport.

Pottawatomie State Lake #2 is one smaller fishing area around Manhattan that students such as Tony Rempe, junior in marketing, frequent.

"It's a lot more accessible, and your luck of catching something is better if you find a spot that hasn't been fished often," Rempe said.

Although there is consequently less water and fish at the smaller Pottawatomie Lake, just northeast of Manhattan, it provides a good fishing option for students lacking a boat.

"If you have a boat at the bigger lakes, it's nice, but it's rough fishing from shore at a place like Milford," Rempe said.

Though he enjoys "Pot. 2," as he and others call the state lake, Rempe prefers taking his fishing rods and gear to even smaller venues, such as relatively unknown farm ponds.

Rempe said fish at smaller ponds tend to be bigger and more active, meaning they're more likely to take the bait.

"Fish at some of these places have hardly seen a lure," Rempe said. "It's like fishing virgin water."

For those who seek the challenge of nabbing a catch from Milford Reservoir, the state's largest body of water, conditions are favorable, according to www.kdwp.state.ks.us, the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks web site.

Fishing conditions for black bass, white bass, catfish and wiper fish all received a rating of "fair," according to the latest report.

Reasons vary as to why students elect to hit the lake, pond or river in their spare time instead of other sports and hobbies.

Jake Hoppes, senior in marketing, simply enjoys the outdoor atmosphere.

"Fishing is a good way to go outside every once in awhile and have a few beers," Hoppes said.

Rempe finds the mental game of fishing to be a challenge and the main reason he loves the sport.

"I like trying to outsmart the fish," he said. "It's the idea of being able to control something beyond control."

With fall firmly set in and colder weather biting at its heels, the opportunity to fish is decreasing by the day.

"I'm trying to get out as much as possible now, because I get cabin fever in the winter," Rempe said.

Hoppes, meanwhile, wishes he could get out and fish more. Period.

"I've been too busy with school this year," he said. "It just gets in the way of my fishing."

Volleyball hopes to continue Big 12 dominance tonight at KU

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

No matter how you look at it – eight straight, 20 of the last 21, 10-0 at home – the No. 7-ranked K-State volleyball team continues to win.

Since joining the NCAA in 1981, the Cats have not enjoyed a better start than this year's 20-3 record.

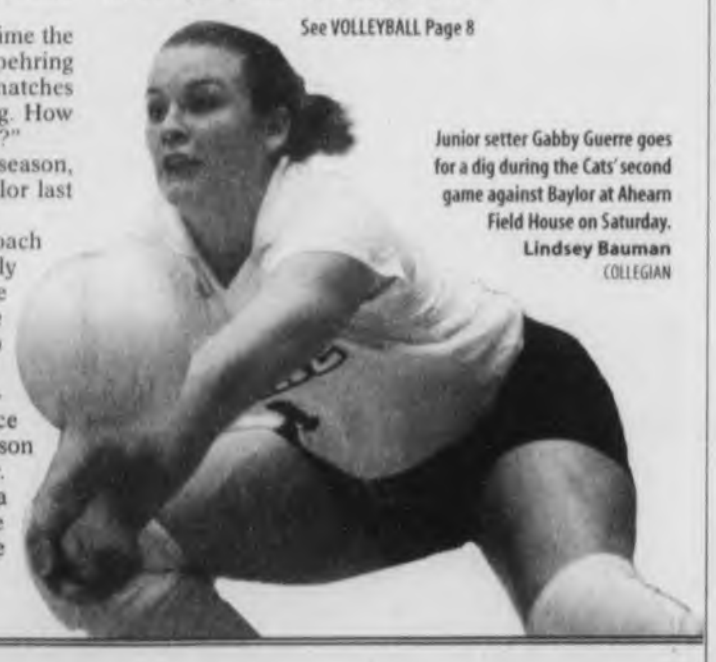
The No. 7 national ranking in the USA Today/AVCA coaches' poll is also the highest in school history.

The show continues tonight in Lawrence as K-State visits the Horejsi Family Athletics Center.

"We just prepare every game one game at a time the same way," senior middle blocker Lauren Goehring said. "They always play one of their best matches against us because it's that in-state rivalry thing. How can you not get fired up for something like that?"

Going into the final stretch of the regular season, the Cats are coming off a 3-0 win against Baylor last Saturday.

"We played very well against Baylor," Coach Suzie Fritz said. "We executed very consistently and we didn't make a lot of errors. I think there is still a long list of things that we can improve upon and have to improve upon if we want to accomplish the things that we're talking about."



Fritz said her team divided up the season into fourths – preseason, first half of conference play, second half of conference play and postseason – with a sort of resetting following each quarter.

"I think that's a good way for us to just get a mindset that it doesn't matter what we've done to this point," Fritz said. "We've proven in the first half that we have an opportunity to be in the hunt for the conference championship. That's all we wanted to do.

"Now we've got to go and win it in the second half. That's what our focus is right now. Continue to take one game at a time and try and win the second half of the season. That's been our philosophy."

Although the Jayhawks' 14-8, 6-5 record puts them right in the middle of the Big 12, four of their last eight matches have gone five games, including two match ups against top-25 opponents.

Ahearn Field House boasts rich, long history from the ground up

ANDI RICE

Inside Ahearn Field House is something more valuable than gold for a basketball fan.

Forget all the broken records or games played in the monumental building, or the trophies that showcase some very memorable K-State moments.

It's the floor I want.

I want what now is used as the No. 8-ranked volleyball team's court.

When I was watching the Cats hand Baylor a 3-0 loss, the lifetime Manhattan resident I was sitting with was reminiscing about all the basketball history she had seen in the building. She finished with a sentence that really caught my attention: "And a lot of it took place on that court."

It took me a few minutes to realize what she had said, and finally I said, "That court?" pointing to the volleyball floor.

She explained to me how the basketball court that was used pre-Bramlage was cut and refinished into a volleyball court.

After trying to find out exactly how old the court is, nobody in the athletic department could tell me.

It was there before any of them got to K-State.

They know it was there before Bramlage opened in 1988 and given the estimation that a court back in those days lasted more than 10 years, it could have been there around 1978.

Can you imagine the history of that floor?

In 1978, the men's basketball team roster included K-State greats Rolando Blackman, Mike Evans, and Curtis Redding with the legendary Jack Hartman as the coach. That year also was the most memorable exhibition game against the Soviet National team, when K-State beat the Russians, 57-54.

If I had that floor, I could stand in the place where Rolando Blackman's buzzer-beating baseline jump shot pushed the Wildcats two points ahead of No. 1 ranked Oregon State in 1981 anytime of the day or night.

In the final year that the floor was used as a basketball court, Steve Henson and Mitch Richmond held Oklahoma to just 62 points, when they had been averaging 112 per game and were ranked No. 3. The Henson-Richmond duo also played with the likes of Kansas' 1988 Championship squad that included Danny Manning and Kevin Prichard, and only lost by one point on that floor.

Nappy Roots to perform at Alpha Phi Alpha's Neak Frasty concert

By Wendy Gorman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students: prepare to get your freak on with the Grammy-nominated hip-hop group, Nappy Roots.

Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity will be host to the 13th annual Neak Frasty step show and concert Saturday at McCain Auditorium. This year Nappy Roots is the featured recording artist of the show.

"It started in Ahearn Field House as a little step show exhibition," said Orion Carrington, special events programmer for Alpha Phi Alpha.

"It started growing from there. Six years after that we started implementing national recording artists. The first we brought in was Soul IV Real."

Neak Frasty has also featured 112, Ginuwine, Goodie Mob, Ja Rule, Carl Thomas and Silk.

CONCERT WITH NAPPY ROOTS

According to Nappy Roots' Web site, the six-man group from Kentucky was the best-selling hip-hop group of 2002. The group received two Grammy Award nominations in 2003: for Best Rap/Sung Collaboration for "Po' Folks," and for Best Long Form Music Video for their DVD, "The World According to Nappy."

Nappy Roots released its newest album, Wooden Leather, on Aug. 26, 2003 and have been promoting nonstop, said group member B. Stille of Louisville, Ken.

"Every day we show up in a different city, so I really don't focus on what's happening three weeks from now," he said.

"I really focus on tonight. We just keeping going on the path. We're proud of this project. We think it's going to be one of the best albums put out this year."

Stille said that Nappy Roots has played in small towns all over the country, and the group appreciates the small-town atmosphere.

"It's more intimate," Stille said. "You get a more one-on-one basis with your fans. Nobody really comes to those small towns, so they appreciate it a lot more."

Nappy Roots' first album, "Watermelon, Chicken & Gritz," features such well-known songs as "Awnaw" and "Po' Folk," and the concert will include songs from both the old album and the new release.

"We do half and half," Stille said.

"It was a kind of hard transition because we had this new album and nobody knew the songs. In actuality, nobody's going to buy the album if they don't hear the new material."

Stille said that many of the songs on "Wooden Leather" were produced on the west coast. Because of this, he said, the album has a laid-back feel.

Nappy Roots was formed at Western Kentucky University between 1993 and 1997, Stille said. The group was made up of a different number of people each year. One of the members, Big V, did not attend college with the others.

"Big V was a native of Bowling Green, Ken. We called him the King of Bowling Green at the time. He was our pass to everything outside campus.

"He was well-respected in the community, and we came along and we got the same respect."

The group was invited to perform for US troops in the Persian Gulf in the USO Project Salute 2003 this past June.

"Just seeing the looks on the faces of those troops was breathtaking," Stille said.

"You felt like you really did something and it was worth more than any check from any school or anything. We didn't rest over there. We went all day from nine in the morning to 2 a.m. just going to different places in the desert. They didn't let a lot of people come to the main shows, so that's why we went out into the field."

STEP SHOW AND AFTER-PARTY

Carrington said that Alpha Phi Alpha was excited that Neak Frasty, the concert and step show, would be the official Saturday event for Homecoming.

"Stepping is a big part of fraternities and sororities and a big part of our history," Carrington said.

"It's a means of black greeks to showcase their particular fraternity and their culture and the personality of their membership in the form of step. Each fraternity and sorority has their own distinctive moves and the way they portray stepping. It's like a reflection of what their fraternity and sorority means."

Carrington said the official after-party would be held immediately after the concert in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

"They're going to play all different kinds of music. It's an opportunity for everybody to come have a great time and promote unity among students on campus through music, and it's an opportunity to party. It's a blast. People always thoroughly enjoy it," Carrington said.

Rachel Hogan, junior in public relations, said she bought tickets for the Neak Frasty.

"We had an exchange dinner and the boys from Alpha Phi Alpha came over and started talking about it," Hogan said.

"I had seen a step competition on ESPN and thought it would be cool. Then, when I heard Nappy Roots was going to be there, I definitely wanted to go."

B. Stille promised a great show for this Saturday.

"Anybody who doesn't have a ticket better go get one now," he said.

Children's Carnival fun for everyone

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Union Program Council has organized a Children's Carnival for at least three years.

This year is no exception to that tradition.

From 4:30 to 7:30 tonight, the event will fill the the Union Courtyard with food, games, prizes and crafts. The carnival features all these things free of cost.

Kelly Ernst, traditions committee chair and senior in mass communications, said the children's favorite part of the festival is the candy.

"Like always, it's the candy," Ernst said. "They like it best."

Ernst said the activities at the carnival are a bean bag toss, pop toss, pumpkin decorating and candy corn crafts.

"We have so much stuff, it's hard to name all the activities that we're doing. It should be fun, though," Ernst said.

She said a costume contest will be at 6:30 p.m.

"We had the costume contest last year, and we will do it again this year. We have prizes for different age groups, from birth to five years and from five to 10, we've got different age categories for winners," Ernst said.

Ernst said that although originally the carnival's purpose was to benefit non-traditional students, it has changed over the years and now everyone is welcome to attend.

"It's a great chance to do things with kids and not be in the cold," she said.

"Motivation is normally not a factor with KU-K-State," Fritz said. "Kansas can be a very difficult place to play. I think they are a good team and certainly a very dangerous team at home, and I don't think our preparation for them is any different than we do for anyone else."

With nine games remaining on the regular-season schedule, a team that has gotten used to being the hunter over the past few seasons has suddenly become the hunted.

"It's been an adjustment for our team," Fritz said. "You can't be average on any given night because everybody is going to bring their best effort. If they knock you off, it's a significant win for them because you are leading the conference and you are nationally ranked and you are all these things."

Exactly 50 days from the start of the Final Four, the second match of the third quarter of a four-part Wildcat season starts at 7 tonight.

"They do in system run things very fast," Fritz said. "Speed can cause you problems. It'll be a good test for us because we've been able to play at home often here recently. It'll be a good test to get back on the road and see if we can put it together in somebody else's gym."

And the final game played on that court could have said goodbye to Ahearn no better. The Wildcats, coached by Lon Krueger, played a hard-fought battle with the Missouri Tigers and sent Ahearn out with a 92-82 victory in front of a sell-out crowd.

The crowd included Jack Gardner, Tex Winter, Cotton Fitzsimmons and Hartman – the other four Ahearn coaches in the building's 38-year history.

The outer area of the floor that was cut off the basketball court is still in Ahearn Field House somewhere.

When I told one of my friends he had the brilliant idea of getting the leftover remnants that were cut away and using them as floor covering in his living room.

Now I don't like to steal the thoughts of others, but that is a unique idea. Can you imagine sleeping in the same house with the footprints of the K-State greats?

At the final game in Ahearn there were fans with a sign that read, "If this old barn were built on memories, it would stand 1,000 years."

But I might alter it and say, "If the floor were built on footprints – it'd stand forever."

But the transition wasn't that easy, defensive coordinator Bob Elliot said.

"It's been a slow process early," he said, "but somewhere, the third or fourth game, it clicked. He's responded and played much better. He's practicing better and it leads me to believe his progress won't stop."

Williams has become entrenched opposite Randy Jordan at corner and continues to improve every week, Elliot said.

But he was quick to say Williams wasn't on the same level as Newman – at least not yet.

"I don't know if he's at the Terence Newman level," Elliot said, "but he might get there. He's getting better every day."

RELATIONSHIPS | Administration discusses code

specific policy, K-State generally has accepted professional norms that consider these types of relationships unacceptable and unethical.

He added that the same professional expectations apply to graduate assistants who work with undergraduate students.

Vladimir Yevseyenkov, graduate student in biochemistry, said he watches everything he does and says in classes with extra caution.

"When I was an undergraduate, a girl in my lab got a lab TA suspended for a while because he was telling jokes with sexual content. I learned a wonderful lesson that day," he said.

This is a mild form of a sexual harassment, a charge that sometimes arises from what appeared to start as a consensual relationship.

Clyde Howard, director of the Office of Affirmative Action, said his office investigated some cases brought against faculty members by students who initially were involved in consensual relationships.

"Often, the relationship is consensual only in the mind of one of the two parties. It is not consensual in another person's mind, and the person just goes along with it," Howard said.

He said some students might feel flattered by attention, excited about going to conferences, or just eager to advance in their study when they accept seemingly inoffensive offer to come to the office or meet for lunch.

"This is a subtle seduction," Howard said.

According to the Office of Affirmative Action, since October 2002 there have been nine total sexual harassment complaints at K-State, and a violation was found in six cases.

Not all of these involved a professor-student relationship.

Howard said none of these cases started as a consensual relationship, but there have been situations previously.

Robert Shoop, professor of educational law and co-editor of the book "Sexual Harassment on Campus," said this statistic is average for a university of K-State's size.

He said 5 to 10 percent of sexual harassment cases are reported.

"Often, the relationship is consensual only in the mind of one of the two parties."

Clyde Howard
DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

"One of the reasons a faculty member can get away abusing a student is because most of the students never tell anybody," Shoop said.

Shoop said a statement of the university's beliefs regarding consensual relationships would be "a reasonable statement to have."

"The problem is that if you don't have any kind of policy and there is litigation as a result of consensual relationship, a university would have some exposure for having a teacher that harmed a student," Shoop said.

He said that in the absence of a statement clarifying a university position on this issue a university might be more vulnerable to charges of environmental sexual harassment or harboring potentially harmful behavior.

READERSHIP | Papers popular

Newspapers cost the university 40 cents per copy for the New York Times and 35 cents per copy for the remaining four newspapers. At the conclusion of the pilot program, USA Today estimated that 20 percent of students would take advantage of the program, which brings the cost to $5 per semester per student. Current statistics were not available, a USA Today representative said.

Charles Reagan, assistant to the president, said he utilizes the readership services in his Introduction to Moral Philosophy class.

"I urge students to read newspapers every day, and I show them from papers I bring in that virtually everyday one of the issues we are dealing with in class is covered," he said.

"I don't require them, but there is no excuse for not looking at the papers because there are a bunch of different drop points," he said. "They are well-placed on campus. Anyone who wants a good newspaper can get one for free and a few of my students have told me that they are taking advantage of it. I don't think I have seen the evidence."

Barb Smith, journalism instructor, said she requires students to read newspapers online and in print several times a week.

"When I go to the Union, all the papers are gone by 2 p.m.," Smith said. "That's an indication students are taking advantage of it."

Although he said he agrees with the program in theory, Reagan said it remains to be seen if it is worth the money.

"It might be too soon to tell," he said. "Reading a newspaper is a habit. I think it's an important move in the right direction. I am rather stunned that students show a lack of interest in what is going on."

O'Hara said although the program might still be gaining popularity, it is one of the few student-centered enhancements that has instant benefits.

"I think this is a very visible student-centered enhancement that all students have the ability to benefit from," O'Hara said. "It's added to the quality of our education at K-State."

from a nearby rooftop.

And a U.S. military convoy was attacked Tuesday night by small arms fire in the northern city of Mosul, the military said. There were no casualties.

The explosion occurred about 100 yards from a police station and 100 feet from a school, but the target was unclear.

Later Tuesday, eight huge explosions were heard after sundown from the southern area of Fallujah. U.S. officials in Baghdad said they were unaware of the blasts, which residents described as "deafening."

In Baghdad, at least three mortar shells exploded late Tuesday in the Jadriya district across the Tigris River from the palace headquarters of the U.S.-led coalition, Iraqi police said. There was no immediate word on casualties or damage.

Student charged in baby's death

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLATHE, Kan. – A K-State student who is accused of leaving her newborn baby in a trash bin has been charged with reckless second-degree murder.

Prosecutors contend Aubrey Christine Owen, 20, sophomore in modern language, abandoned the full-term newborn after the baby was born alive. Owen turned herself in to Johnson County authorities Tuesday and was later released on $100,000 bond.

A trash collector found the baby's body in a duffel bag in a trash bin on Oct. 13. Authorities were led to Owen because materials containing her name also were found.

Prosecutors said Owen "unintentionally but recklessly" killed the baby by putting her inside the bag and abandoning her in the bin. The charge alleges that she displayed "extreme indifference" to human life.

Prosecutors said authorities believe that Owen, a student at K-State, gave birth at her parents' home in Olathe. Morrison said the parents apparently did not know she was pregnant.

Scholarships to encourage studies abroad

Tuition-increase revenue designated to increase international studies

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Using $55,000 in scholarships, the global education initiative aims to lure more students to study abroad.

The money, a portion of tuition revenue designated for student-centered enhancements, is divided into $1,000 scholarships for anyone wishing to study abroad.

"Two percent of the student body studies abroad, and the national average is about 5 percent," Student Body President John O'Hara, who has studied in Spain, said. "President Wefald was recently quoted saying he wants 10 percent. The support is there from the top of our administration."

Twenty-eight scholarships are available for students studying in the spring.

Ken Holland, associate provost of international programs, said he received 59 applications by the Oct. 10 deadline. Students wanting to study abroad in the summer or fall will be able to apply for one of the 27 available scholarships by a March deadline.

"The student has to be willing to volunteer to work in the office for a few hours a week after they return to talk to other interested students," Holland said. "Secondly, they have to have a good grade point average. Thirdly, priority is given to students who want to travel to less popular areas – countries outside of Western Europe and Australia.

However, with only 55 scholarships available, his goal of having 1,000 students study abroad will not be accomplished this year, O'Hara said.

"This is just a step in the right direction," he said. "We need to evaluate the amount of money we give out. We need to increase scholarship support. Will it allow 1,000 students to study abroad? No, but it's a good step."

But in order to get more students involved, there needs to be administration support when interacting with new students.

See STUDY ABROAD Page 12

Enhancing K-State

Students will be asked to consider what services they want to see continue with next year's tuition increase. Five percent of tuition revenue is designated for student-centered enhancements, which are recommended by the Student Senate academic affairs and executive committees and approved by university administration.

Waiters, waitresses can earn more by being friendly

By Amy Preston

Jason Bullok has to be friendly.

Not overly friendly, but just plain friendly – especially to receive good tips.

The waiter at Harry's Uptown said making good tips is all about the wait staff's interaction with the customer.

"You're mostly trying to make a good rapport with the customer by conversing with them and making them feel comfortable," Bullok said.

He's not the only one with the friendly focus.

Miranda Smith, assistant manager at Applebee's Neighborhood Grill and Bar, said talkative and friendly waiters and waitresses at the restaurant tend to have an edge in getting higher tips.

"The more interested you are in a person, the better you have it," Smith said.

Jason Beninga, nighttime manager at Little Apple Brewing Co., said many members of the restaurant's wait staff tend to have their own style when waiting tables – a trait that fares well at the end of a shift.

"Our restaurant is pretty personable," Beninga said. "The more individualistic you can be, the better your tips are."

Some restaurants, like Chili's Bar and Grill, offer suggestions for waiters and waitresses to make better tips during a five-day training program.

Enrollment sees changes

KATS to prevent students from abusing system

By Amy Lundine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Precautions have been taken to prevent students from enrolling in multiple sections of a class in order to reserve spots in courses for their peers.

Students have used KATS online enrollment to add unnecessary courses to their schedules, and then drop them in time for their friends to pick them up. However, in the process, they have taken course openings away from others who deserve a fair chance to enroll.

"We call it place holding," said Charles Sanders, assistant professor in the history department. "Either they can't make up their minds or they are enrolling for someone else."

Sanders and others in the history department began a system in spring 2003 to prevent this from occurring in the future.

The department sends out an e-mail notification to all students who are enrolled in more than four history classes, Sanders said.

The e-mail tells them to reply within 24 hours giving their reason for the number of courses, or drop the ones they do not plan on taking.

If these students do not respond or drop the courses within 24 hours, all of the courses on their schedule will be erased.

Sanders said every one of the students that they have contacted was place holding, although no one has had their schedules erased because all the students who were contacted responded to the e-mail and dropped their unnecessary courses within the required time frame.

University Registrar Monty Nielsen said KATS is now programmed to allow students to enroll in a maximum of 21 credit hours.

"Students were also able to enroll in multiple reference numbers of the same course," Nielsen said. "That has been modified so that it is now prohibited."

Sanders stressed that although the new rules are strict, the best interests of the students are in mind.

"After all, it is the students that are getting hurt. It's not the faculty," Sanders said.

John O'Hara, student body vice president, said that he and Travis Stryker, student body vice president, spoke with about 55 student organizations at K-State and found that this was a commonly voiced problem.

HOW-TO

Winterize your car

As colder temperatures approach, it's time to winterize your car.

A general survey of fluids and pressures should be done regularly, but it is especially important when cold temperatures can cause freezing, expansion and condensation.

COOLING SYSTEM

Be sure to check both the radiator and overfill tank.

The antifreeze should test zero year-round to ensure the hot engine doesn't boil the antifreeze away.

WINDSHIELD WASHER FLUID

Low-alcohol fluid will freeze in colder temperatures and cause more of a mess than what you had before.

TIRE PRESSURE

Checking the tire pressure is important during the first few weeks of cold weather to ensure it stays near its ideal pressure. Proper pressure helps maintain alignment and gas mileage.

BATTERY TEST

To ensure you don't end up stranded at your crazy aunt's house on New Year's Eve, be sure to check your battery.

AUTO-ILLITERATE?

If you aren't confident enough to do it yourself, almost any service shop will have a package for winterizing or general maintenance of your vehicle.

Final 4 student ambassador candidates vie for position

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Voting for the two new K-State Student Ambassadors begins today. The four remaining candidates are Victoria Luhrs, Kristy Tredway, Seth Sanders and Lance Zimmerman.

Every year, one male and one female are elected to represent the student body to alumni and at recruitment. Missy Decker-Heidrick, associate director of alumni programs, said she highly encourages students to vote.

"It's a great way for students to give themselves a voice of who represents them on campus. The people they elect will be the outgoing person with a great personality who will end up representing K-State," Decker-Heidrick said.

Voting takes place from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union and 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. today in the dining centers. Students only need their student ID to vote.

Ambassador candidates were narrowed down to four through submitting an application and a series of interviews.

The four remaining candidates answered three questions about their ability to become a student ambassador.

Female candidate Luhrs, junior in secondary education, has been involved with Alpha Chi Omega sorority, student alumni board and the honoraries.

Q) Why is K-State of importance to you?

A) "I love the people and love being on campus and in organizations. The alumni and students are of high importance to me as well."

Q) What were your reasons for running for ambassador?

A) "I decided to share K-State with people. The excitement they give me I want to share with the alumni."

Q) What should influence people to vote for you?

A) "A sincere desire to do it and make a difference. I love K-State."

Female candidate Tredway, junior in agricultural economics, has been involved with Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority, Student Alumni Board, Student Alumni Association, Agricultural Economics Club and is an Agricultural Ambassador.

Q) Why is K-State of importance to you?

A) "K-State is the home that's leading me to a great career and a quality life. This has helped build the foundation for who I am today."

Q) What were your reasons for running for ambassador?

A) "K-State made an awesome first impression and has enriched my life. I want to be certain that all people who come in contact with Kansas State University have this same powerful experience."

Q) What should influence people to vote for you?

A) "I am experienced, confident, and most importantly, passionate about this university. It would be an honor to represent such a tremendous student body."

Male candidate Sanders, junior in finance, has been involved with Student Alumni Board, President of Silver Key, member of Chimes, Social Chair of FarmHouse fraternity, Special Olympics Volunteer and Fellowship of Christian Athletes member.

Q) Why is K-State of importance to you?

A) "Because of the experience I've had here – everything from pizza at 2 in the morning, studying late at Hale, sleeping at Hale, Saturday morning football games, those crazy squirrels, life long friendships and, of course, the Kreem Kup."

Q) What were your reasons for running for ambassador?

A) "K-State has given me some of the greatest times of my life.

It is the one place that has shown me every opportunity in the world to grow as a scholar and as a person. I want to show others the potential K-State has to make for the best four, five, or even six or seven years of your life."

Q) What should influence people to vote for you?

A) "I bleed purple, and I think my contagious enthusiasm for this university gives me the ability to represent its students and alumni and spread the 'Wildcat Gospel' to the masses."

Most potent geomagnetic storm hits Earth, disrupts airline communication

By Joseph B. Verrengia
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER – The most powerful geomagnetic storm possible walloped the Earth early Wednesday, knocking out some airline communications but apparently causing no large power outages or other major problems.

The storm, the most disruptive to hit Earth since 1989, was unleashed by the fourth-most powerful solar flare ever seen, NASA said.

The gigantic cloud of highly charged particles hurled from the sun posed a threat to electric utilities, high frequency radio communications, satellite navigation systems and television broadcasts. Continued turbulence on the sun remains a concern for the next week, space forecasters say.

The biggest immediate effect was the blackout of high-frequency voice-radio communications for planes flying far northern routes.

But airliners in an emergency could still communicate through VHF contact with another aircraft or military monitoring station, said Louis Garneau, a spokesman for the company that handles Canada's civil aviation navigation service.

British controllers were keeping trans-Atlantic jets on more southerly routes than usual to avoid the problem.

The particle storm, measuring 13 times larger than Earth, was rated a G5, the highest intensity on scientists' scale of space weather. Space observers have measured G5 storms five times in the past 15 years, but few of them have hit Earth so directly.

It whipped through the solar system at about 5 million mph, taking just 19 hours to travel the 93 million miles from the sun to envelop the planet. Federal scientists said it collided with Earth's magnetic field at 1:13 a.m. EST on Wednesday, about 12 hours earlier than predicted.

Last week, a weaker solar flare erupted on the sun's surface, but scientists said the particle cloud from that event largely spared the planet. Yet another major storm was unleashed late Wednesday afternoon, according to media reports.

Such storms pose no direct threat to people on the ground because the Earth's thick atmosphere deflects and absorbs incoming charged particles. But the storm may produce colorful auroras in the northern night sky visible as far south as El Paso, Texas, beginning late Wednesday.

The last time a G5 storm hit Earth was in 1989, which damaged the power grid and caused electrical blackouts in the Canadian province of Quebec.

"It is extremely rare to get this level of geomagnetic storming," said Larry Combs, forecaster for the Space Weather Center at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in Boulder. "This is one of the strongest storms that we have received during this cycle."

were few immediate reports of damage related to the geomagnetic storm. However, Combs said, "We know that our power grids are definitely feeling the effects of this."

National project to utilize K-State's popular red flour beetle specimen

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Who knew a beetle could be so important to K-State research?

The red flour beetle, K-State's most popular specimen to work with, has been selected to undergo a national genome sequencing project.

Susan Brown, associate professor of biology, said she and two other researchers from K-State wrote a paper explaining to the board why the beetle was perfect for the project.

"We got together and wrote a paper that influenced the board that this beetle was worth working with," Brown said.

"The red flour beetle is perfect for a genome sequencing project. It has a small genome, and it can easily create mutants."

She said this is the first organism in Kansas to be sequenced.

Brown said the beetle is the most popular specimen in the state.

"A lot of things are difficult to raise in labs, but the beetle can live about anywhere. If you aren't careful, it can live in your flour at home. It is perfect to raise and test on in labs," Brown said.

Richard Beeman, adjunct professor of entomology and research entomologist at the US Grain Marketing and Production Research Center, said the project is in association with the United States Department of Agriculture.

Beeman said the beetle genome sequencing project was considered along with other specimens after the human genome had been sequenced.

"A couple of years ago, the human genome was sequenced, but after the capacity to do that was built up, it was finished and left with nothing to do. They decided to start with other species," Beeman said.

The red flour beetle is a pest in flour mills but has a good genetic model, he said.

Brown said this research may lead to pesticides and even antibiotics for humans.

"This could help build up the targets for pesticides and even unveil a cool new source of antibiotics.

"These beetles live with bacterium and may have developed a method to protect themselves from the bacteria," she said.

Brown said the research of the red flour beetle is on a list, and may be started in about two years.

"We are just in line with several other species right now. The beetle project is a bigger species than flies, and we look forward to this type of research," she said.

TO THE POINT

Students should not have to pay for others to take college classes abroad

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

The scholarships, each totaling $1,000, are part of a global education initiative aimed at meeting President Wefald's goal of 10 percent of K-State students studying abroad.

There are two fundamental problems with this strategy.

First, tuition revenue will never be able to meet that goal entirely. Providing such scholarships for 1,000 students, assuming there is even that much interest, would cost $1 million.

The other problem is more of a philosophical question. Why should some K-State students pay for others to go to school, regardless of the location?

Scholarships should come from alumni donations, fund raising and even corporate sponsorship, but never student pockets.

Most likely, K-State will have to reach out to these sources if it ever hopes to reach the goal of 1,000 students, but by tapping tuition first, a bad precedent has been set.

This is one enhancement that K-State students do not need in a time of fiscal crisis.

Name and blame the victim

She was bragging later that night. She loves to have sex and she had two boyfriends at the time.

LINDSEY PRAECHTER

A trial by the media is under way as perceptions of the alleged victim in the Kobe Bryant case are publicized throughout the nation, tainting the jury pool.

Phrases like these can be found in almost every news story and, in many cases, have been initiated by the defense's leaking loaded questions.

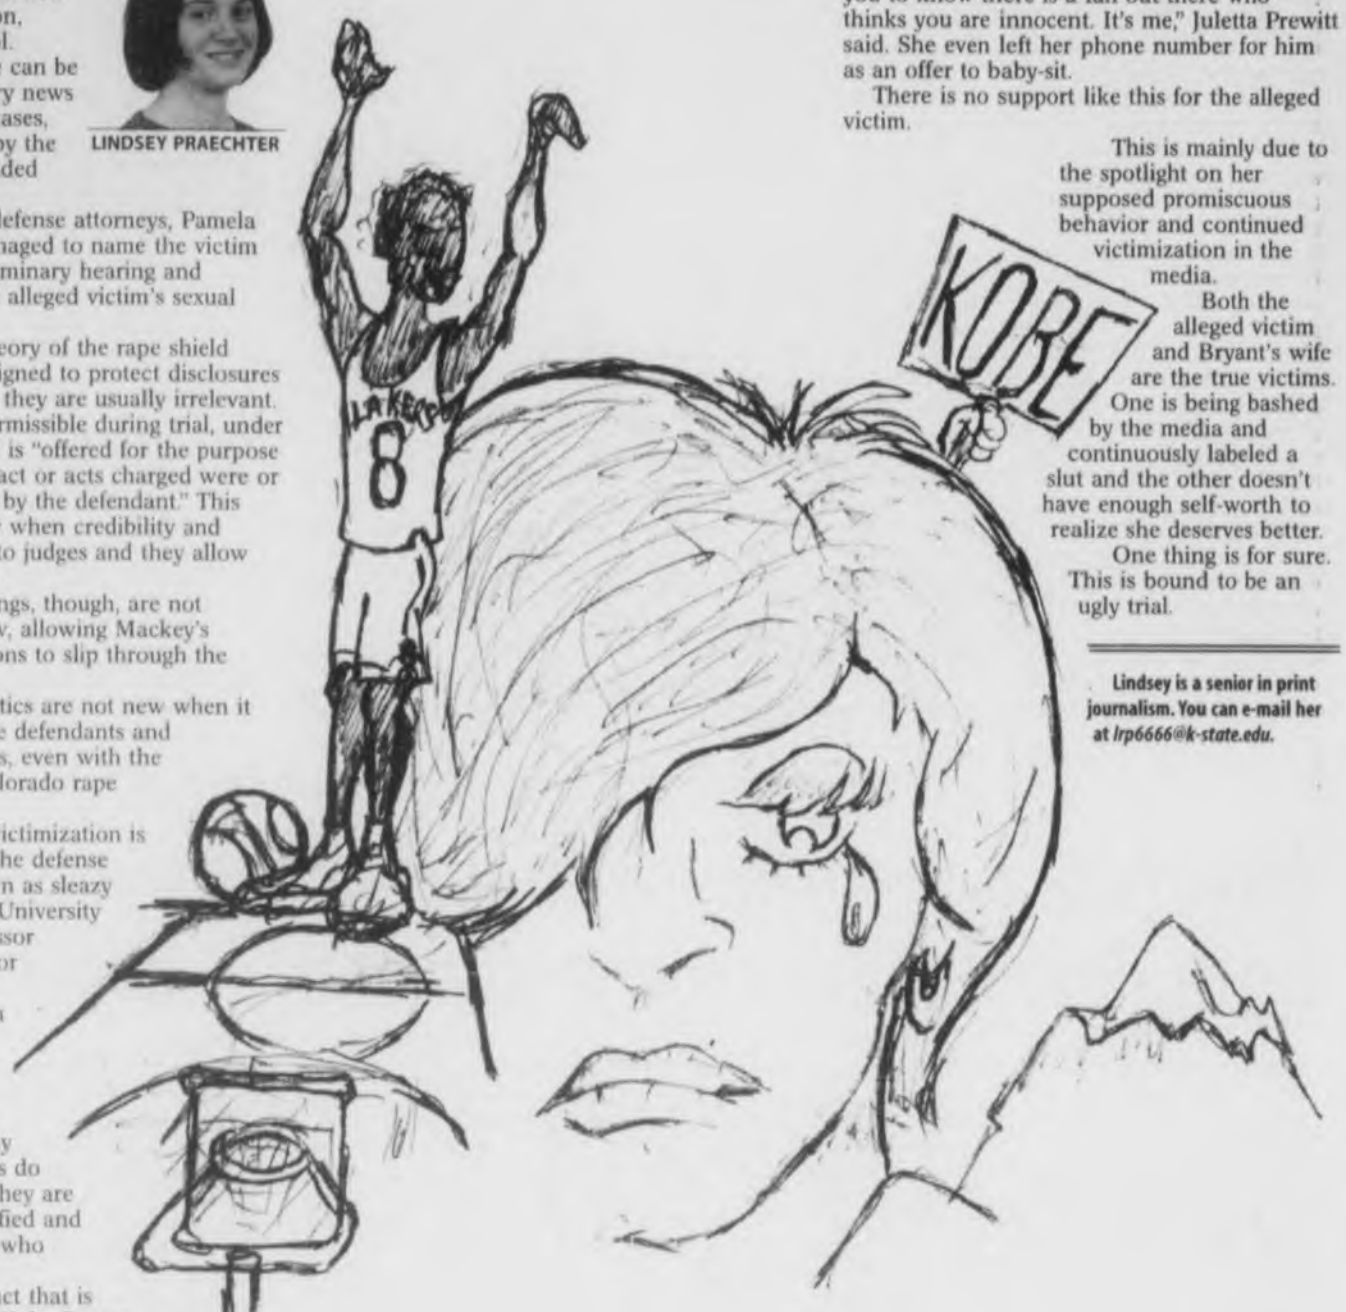
One of Bryant's defense attorneys, Pamela Mackey, already managed to name the victim six times in the preliminary hearing and revealed hints of the alleged victim's sexual history.

This defies the theory of the rape shield statute, which is designed to protect disclosures such as this because they are usually irrelevant.

Information is permissible during trial, under Colorado's laws, if it is "offered for the purpose of showing that the act or acts charged were or were not committed by the defendant." This exception exists only when credibility and relevance is proven to judges and they allow the evidence in trial.

Preliminary hearings, though, are not mentioned in the law, allowing Mackey's normally illegal actions to slip through the loophole.

These defense tactics are not new when it comes to high-profile defendants and sexual assault victims, even with the notoriously strict Colorado rape shield statute.



This continuous victimization is the obvious goal of the defense team, which is known as sleazy but not unethical, a University of Denver law professor and former prosecutor said.

This is exactly why sexual assault victims do not come forward. They are afraid of being classified and judged publicly, and who wouldn't be afraid? However, the only fact that is really known is that Kobe Bryant cheated on his wife, which he admits.

Since he is innocent until proven otherwise in this case, no one can say he is guilty of this crime until the trial is over. But one can openly say he is guilty of adultery, if not with this accuser, than with another.

There is even a Web site, "Pray for Kobe," at www.prayforkobe.com, where prayers are posted in support of Bryant and his innocence. A 14-year-old girl posted a prayer proclaiming Bryant's innocence.

"I am writing you this letter because I want you to know there is a fan out there who thinks you are innocent. It's me," Juletta Prewitt said. She even left her phone number for him as an offer to baby-sit.

There is no support like this for the alleged victim.

Both the alleged victim and Bryant's wife are the true victims. One is being bashed by the media and continuously labeled a slut and the other doesn't have enough self-worth to realize she deserves better.

Husband could pick divorce over death

CORBIN H. CRABLE

Schiavo, who has been in a persistent vegetative state since a heart attack in 1990, was put back on fluids last week when Florida Gov. Jeb Bush struck down an order that her feeding tube be removed.

Politicians have been toying with her life for years. Last week was the second time her tube was removed and inserted once more. She has been brought to the brink of death and back time and again.

Perhaps just as damaging to Terri as this physical battle is the way in which she is being treated by her so-called "caretaker," her husband.

I saw Terri's husband, Michael, on "Larry King Live" last week and knew immediately this was more than a question of whether this woman should be kept alive or be allowed to die. Michael Schiavo's selfishness now has come into play.

Michael asserts Terri had told him if she were to become comatose, she would want to die, and he's only trying to honor her wishes. Michael Schiavo's attempt to martyr himself degrades his wife, as does his forbidding Terri's own family to visit her until recently.

Michael's statement that he is trying to honor his wife's wishes by allowing her to die masks more believable motives.

According to www.cnn.com, Michael Schiavo denied physical and speech rehabilitation therapy for his wife. If he were positive she would never be conscious again, why did he refuse the therapy?

If there were a possibility, even slight, that Terri had hope for recovery, as many doctors said there was, why wouldn't a loving husband want this for his wife? Even if the therapy didn't work, he had nothing to lose.

An argument that further damages Michael Schiavo's reputation is that he has received thousands of dollars in settlements of malpractice suits from his wife's gynecologist, and he will refuse to say if she has an outstanding life insurance policy.

There's no doubt in my mind that money is a huge factor in his attempts to end her life. This makes Michael Schiavo look sketchy in my book.

All he has to do is admit he's tired of being his wife's caretaker and just divorce her. According to an Oct. 24 article on www.cnn.com, a friend of the family said that right before Terri's heart attack, the couple was planning to divorce anyway.

If Terri hadn't become comatose, the divorce likely would've gone off without a hitch. Instead, Michael insults his wife by saying, in the name of love, that he is trying to fulfill her wishes.

Terri Schiavo deserves better than this. Even if her wishes to die are honored, she will die by starvation, a fate that I wouldn't wish on a dog. The death, which she has faced more than once, would be slow and agonizing, and in the end, Michael Schiavo will know he won.

He can begin his new life with his girlfriend and their child, living with the money that came from his wife's pain and suffering. I can only hope the guilt he inevitably will live with plagues him for the rest of his life.

Then, Michael Schiavo will experience a fraction of the pain that Terri is suffering at the hands of her own husband.

I'm agnostic and definitely not Christian. Does that mean I pose a threat to marriage now?

To the article about improving advising as a wise use of money: Why don't you take that money and go ahead and buy us some faculty that can actually speak some English.

Jesse Ventura got elected governor of Minnesota, so I think Mean Gene should've run for governor of California.

Why is President Bush so reluctant to turn over documents to the federal commission investigating the 9/11 attacks? Is he afraid we might find out why he showed no surprise at all when he was told of the attacks?

Yeah, is it OK if I declare next Monday open season on all parking Nazis with my paintball gun?

What's up with only putting four lines in the Fourum? That's the only reason we get this thing.

If gay people choose to be gay, then when did you choose to be straight?

Has anyone noticed that the Fourum is getting smaller and smaller? I think the Fourum should get bigger and bigger and the rest of the paper should just get smaller.

Virgin chicks should not wear shirts that say "Naughty" or "Bad Kitty" or any other provocative language. It's false advertising.

How many Jayhawks does it take to score a touchdown against K-State? One — Terry Allen.

If there are no stupid questions, then what kind of questions do stupid people ask? Do they get smart just in time to ask questions?

Have you ever wondered what neckties point to?

Really, spending a few bucks on a girlfriend now is no big deal. The wedding's gonna be 20 grand anyway.

TO THE EDITOR

SGA should not push marriage protection stance on all students

Editor,

Student Senate will vote tonight on a resolution denouncing the Marriage Protection Week proclamation made by Mayor Mark Taussig a few weeks ago.

This resolution speaks to those who want to destroy the institution of marriage and promote the homosexual agenda. To understand what the authors of this resolution are saying, one must look at Taussig's proclamation regarding marriage and then compare that to the text of the resolution.

The second phrase of Taussig's proclamation reads, "The family is an essential part of American culture. It is impossible to deny the tremendous contributions responsible men and women have made in committing to each other to marry, to raise a family and to teach their children the value of human life, love of God and their fellow man, morality, good citizenship and responsible behavior."

Now, the opposing view is taken from the second and third phrases of the resolution:

"This proclamation is an assault on the basic human rights and dignity of many members of the Manhattan community, including many K-State students, whom the Kansas State University Student Governing Association represents.

"This proclamation excludes, alienates, degrades and stigmatizes members of our K-State and Manhattan community who are children of divorced parents or who are divorced themselves; members of our community who identify themselves as gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgendered; and members of our community whose personal beliefs on the institution of marriage differ from those stated in the proclamation."

Most of us in the Manhattan community, and probably most K-State students, have to scratch our heads wondering where in Taussig's resolution there is an "assault on basic human rights."

Is marriage between a man and a woman an assault on basic human rights? Do most of us really feel as though Taussig's proclamation, which echoes the statements from a similar proclamation from President Bush, is out of place?

Taussig and Bush are simply affirming the traditional family unit and their view that society and culture are better off when children are raised with a loving mother and father.

Is that view ridiculous or insane?

Of course not, but that view is frustrating for those promoting the homosexual agenda and for those who no longer adhere to any sort of moral framework.

K-State students need to contact their senators and let them know what they think of this resolution authored by four people in the Student Governing Association.

Let them know that most of the K-State student body doesn't want their student legislative branch spewing out atheistic and amoral proclamations in the name of the entire student body.

The minority interest of those students at K-State who want to destroy the traditional institution of marriage need not be carried in the form of a resolution from Student Senate.

Names of your senators, based on the college that you are enrolled in, can be found by visiting www.ksu.edu/osas/legislative3.htm.

Please contact them and tell them how you feel about this absurd resolution.

Pro-choice advocates admit that fetuses are not human beings

Editor,

I'm writing in response to Emily King's letter to the editor and many of the other abortion-related statements that have been spurred by the Partial Birth Abortion Ban.

For years, the debate on abortion has centered on the argument of whether the fetus is already a human being or whether it's just a fetus, and in the past week students have argued both sides.

However, I would just like to let them know they are a little late.

The pro-life side has already won this battle.

For the most part, the pro-choice movement has abandoned their campaign that the fetus is not yet a baby and moved to one simply of a woman's right. Even abortion doctors will openly admit it is a baby.

If you go to the Web site of Dr. George Tiller, one of the leading abortion doctors in the nation, you will find him openly calling the fetus a baby.

He even offers services to help women grieve the loss of their baby.

Some of these include holding the baby, taking pictures with the baby, taking the baby's hand prints and footprints and even baptizing the baby.

For those women who are ashamed of what they have done, he will even write up a Certificate of Premature Miscarriage to hide the fact that they chose to kill their baby. To see this for yourself, go to www.drtiller.com/remembrance.html.

So, people can stop trying to claim it isn't a baby. If that's the only way they can justify it, they are just deceiving themselves.

Hupp letter was not critical of all Christians

Editor,

I would like to take a moment to respond to the letters in Wednesday's Collegian.

I do not have a problem with Christian beliefs – in fact, I am Catholic.

I do have a problem with the behavior of some people. My letter was not "half-researched." Ever since junior high, I have had numerous incidents with members of the Christian right who belittled and insulted me for my beliefs and condemned me to hell.

I do not want to force my individual beliefs on them, but I do wish they had behaved better. I was taught – in Catholic school, I might add – to treat people the way you would treat Jesus. That means not belittling them for their beliefs.

Did Jesus say, "I am the way, the truth, and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me?"

Yes, but Jesus did not say, "Ridicule those who believe differently."

I am not angry. I am only saddened that people who claim to follow Christ do not treat people the way Christ did.

Losing respect for NBA's best

Bryant has now gone too far

JOEL REICHENBERGER

They said it wouldn't work.

I didn't believe.

They said too many personalities.

I said they'll whoop up.

I was wrong.

The Los Angeles Lakers are destined for failure. The season, which kicked off Tuesday night, is a train wreck the likes which haven't been seen since since the homecoming gods invented Pant the Chant,

The worst problem? The fire comes from within.

But I didn't see it coming.

The Lakers should be the best team ever. With free agent pickups most other teams have wet dreams about in Karl Malone and Gary Payton, along with Kobe Bryant and Shaquille O'Neal, the team features four future Hall-of-Famers.

Four of the best players to ever play – how could they lose?

The critics said there weren't enough points in a game to satisfy so many ambitions. So what, I said. Malone and Payton want to win, and they will do anything.

What I didn't count on is the variable that ended up rocking my world.

Kobe Bryant.

I think Bryant is awesome. You see, when I decide to root for an athlete, I go all out. I'm not a Lakers fan, but I would readily argue that Bryant could be one of the best players ever.

To me, and to everyone else in the sports world, Bryant was a perfect example of an NBA player done right. Any argument about the degradation of NBA players quickly led to Bryant, his virtuous lifestyle and his sincere goodness. He was married, he was quiet, he was all business and he was tearing it up.

But the last couple months have changed that.

And it did something that rarely happens. It changed my opinion.

Bryant, as much as it pains me to admit, is a cancer. The war of words he started with O'Neal, not his alleged rape over the summer, is the proof.

He has long been accused of being a loner in the locker room and failing to really fit in with the rest of the guys.

That was fine when he was a wholesome superstar. Now, saddled with rape charges, I expected him to retreat to the beloved basketball floor.

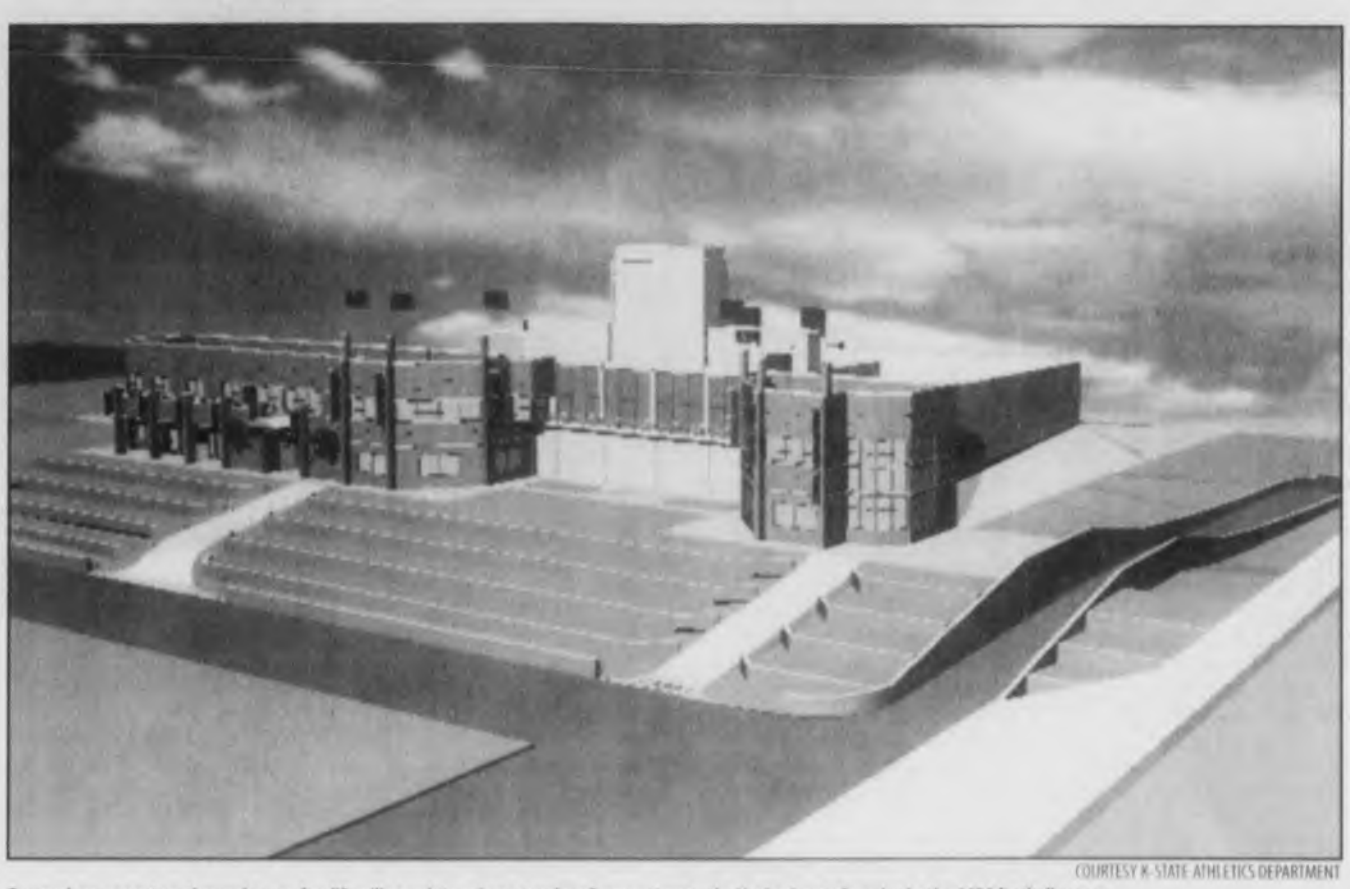
But rather than fit comfortably into the team he seemed to at last bond with, he started World War 3 with a giant, angry man.

In a recent interview with Jim Gray, Bryant called Shaq fat, childlike, jealous and implied he was lazy, selfish and weak when it came to playing with an injury.

Shaq has been no angel, either. He egged on the fight as much as Kobe and honestly, I think many of the put-downs are probably true.

But regardless, Bryant had no business bashing Shaq like that. Now more than ever Bryant needs friends. Why on earth would he distance himself from the biggest one of all?

Plus, the last think he needs is more bad press.



Bryant used to be the golden standard of the NBA. He did things right and was a shining example in a league increasingly full of thugs and criminals.

But he blew that.

And he lost my admiration. Never a Lakers fan, now I have zero reasons to tune in.

A Weiser renovation

COURTESY K-STATE ATHLETICS DEPARTMENT

Terraced permanent seating and a new facelift will complete a six-part series of renovations to the Vanier Sports Complex by the 2004 football season.

Vanier Sports Complex to receive new look

By Andi Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Coach Bill Snyder came to K-State in 1989, he was welcomed with a newly renovated facility and a new office overlooking KSU Stadium's playing field.

Since Snyder's arrival, though, Vanier Football Complex has only received cobbled together-type renovations, assistant athletic director Charlie Thomas said.

"He's stayed in the same office since he's been here," Thomas said, "and nothing has been done to it."

However, a six-phase renovation project of the Vanier Football Complex started last March to bring the facilities up to date.

"It was something we had talked about for quite some time in terms of that building hadn't had a whole lot of attention paid to it," athletic director Tim Weiser said.

"We had some unfinished space that we felt like we could complete so we could gain some more square footage for our weight room needs. It was a combination of taking care of those areas that directly affected our student athletes."

When the Academic Learning Center was added to the complex in 1996, space had been left to add a cafeteria. However, director of development Ernie Barrett said fire marshal regulations wouldn't allow the area to be used for that purpose.

So in Phase I of the current renovations, the weight room was moved north and expanded into the space previously reserved for a cafeteria, and Phase II moved the training room into that footprint of the weight room.

"Our weight room really hasn't been big enough for a football program," Barrett said. "It was a very small one and for about 110 football players that just wasn't big enough. So we were able to enlarge the weight room and bring it up to date with new equipment."

The training room will be equipped with doctor offices and x-ray rooms, as well as a therapy pool to aid athletic injuries.

"As the program exists now, we have to go to the hospitals for x-rays and things like that, and with the added facilities in our training room the doctors are able to x-ray any kind of athletic injury right away," Barrett said.

The phased out project only has funds raised through Phase III, which will last into the beginning of the new year.

Phase I was completed at $339,967 and Phase II cost $310,793. The third phase, which is currently at $422,783, includes revamping the equipment room. Thomas said it will likely end up costing about $550,000.

"That is excluding the gifts that Ernie raises, which comes off that total," Thomas said. "That's the gross dollars, before we have any donor money knocked off."

In fact, Weiser said all the expenses are raised through private donations.

"We approach donors and give them a menu list of things we are interested in doing, and find out if any of those items or particular projects are something they would be interested in," he said.

Wildcat volleyball team plucks the Jayhawks

K-State women wow sellout crowd with 3-2 victory over KU in Lawrence

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LAWRENCE, Ks. – Between 50 and 100 people making the journey to The Horejsi Family Athletic Center in Lawrence were not allowed in, as doors closed 10 minutes before the start of the KU vs. K-State volleyball match.

Seating capacity already had been reached as more than 1,300 people watched a tight contest in which KU had an upset going early, taking a 2-0 lead, before No. 7 K-State (21-3, 11-1) stormed back to beat the Jayhawks, 3-2.

"Part of the identity of this team is that they've been very good in pressure situations and five-game matches," Coach Suzie Fritz said. "I think experience helps, having four seniors on the floor that have been in that situation before and are a little bit more comfortable. As a coach, that is certainly a comforting feeling."

The Cats clawed back, winning three in a row to extend their winning streak to nine. Final scoring was 28-30, 28-30, 30-27, 30-22 and 15-10.

"This was a great victory," freshman Joy Hamlin said. "It's amazing that we were down 2-0 here against the Hawks and their fans. Most teams would have gone flat, but we came out and fought. "

In only her second start, Hamlin had a career night with 12 kills, a .259 attack percentage and scored 19 of the Cats 108 points.

Cari Jensen and Laura Downey-Wallace both dive down to make a dig last night during the second match against Kansas. The Cats won 3 matches to 2.

"Joy has had two really nice matches in a row," Fritz said. "She has good physical size and she's got a good arm, and Gabby (Guerre) got her going early to continue establishing confidence in herself. I'm very proud of her. She played awfully well."

This was the 10th five-game match of the year for KU (14-9, 6-6), and Coach Ray Bechard said his Jayhawks were a better team at match's end than they were when they started.

Bechard has yet to beat Fritz, his former player at Barton County Community College.

"She's obviously doing a pretty good job," he said. "They're very experienced. Some teams get down 0-2 and they're really rattled, but they came to battle and played very well down the stretch. "

While the K-State struggled out of the blocks, Fritz said her team's attitude never wavered.

"We got better," Fritz said. "That's the thing I'm most proud of. We were a better team in game five than we were in game one and that's exciting. That's everything you work for as a coach. "

Next action for the Cats will be Saturday against Colorado in Boulder, exactly two weeks to the day of K-State's 3-0 victory over the Buffs in Ahearn Field House.

NFL | Probe into steroid use, testing begins

The NFL and its players association are working on a plan for a retroactive test for the previously undetectable designer steroid THG.

CFB | Senators against Bowl Championship Series

The Bowl Championship Series shuts out too many schools in its goal of crowning a college football champion and needs to be repaired, senators told representatives of the bowl system Wednesday.

"I don't know if you guys know how it looks to fans of teams that aren't part of this system," said Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del. "It looks un-American. It really does. It looks unfair. It looks like a rigged deal."

Created in 1998 by the six most powerful college conferences, the BCS guarantees that the champions of those conferences will play in one of the four most lucrative postseason bowl games, leaving only two at-large berths.

Division I-A football is the only college sport not to have a playoff system.

MLB | Coaching shakeup ensues after Yanks lose Series

Rick Down is out as the New York Yankees hitting coach, the first move in what figures to be a wild offseason for the World Series losers.

With club officials in Tampa, Fla., this week for meetings with owner George Steinbrenner, Down was told by phone Tuesday that the team will not renew his contract.

Down is the third hitting instructor the Yankees have let go in the last four years. More changes are likely to be made, too. Bench coach Don Zimmer has said several times he won't be back, citing Steinbrenner as the reason, and pitching coach Mel Stottlemyre isn't sure if he wants to return.

Manhattan to drop the ball on New Year's Eve

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This New Year's Eve the ball will drop in Manhattan.

Kate Watson, co-instigator, thought it would be a good idea to simulate the Big Apple's holiday celebration right here in the Little Apple.

"On New Year's Eve, you sit and watch TV and see the ball drop in Times Square," she said. "It must have crossed several people's minds before. I can envision the marquee at Varney's looking like Times Square."

It is still early, but she said the committee is planning on a large turnout.

"I hope that we bring a lot of our different segments of the community together to come in and have a great time," she said. "We all want an excuse to get together in Aggieville and sway to 'Auld Lang Syne.'"

Watson said the committee's first objective is to get the information out so that people will know about it and make plans to attend. She said they are trying to get sponsors to help pay for the event, and Varney's Book Store has already been set as the lead sponsor.

"We are getting interest from other businesses and organizations," she said.

Steve Levin, manager of the K-State Student Union Bookstore, said the ball will be dropped on top of the Varney's building.

Levin said the ball will cost anywhere from $500 to $1,000, and they are hoping to have a local artist help design.

However, the ball may not be the only attraction.

"We're trying to have a fireworks display and entertainment," he said.

Director of research center to speak about cultural diversity

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dan Wildcat, director of the Environmental Research Studies Center and American Indian Studies member at Haskell Indian Nations University, will present "Civilization and its Malcontent: an Unromantic Savage Heathen Reading of Western Civilization."

Wildcat will be discussing cultural diversity.

Barbra Steward, director of the presentation, said the library usually features presentations they believe are unique.

"We usually pride ourselves on a series showcasing prospective cultures. Dan Wildcat is an eloquent and engaging speaker," she said.

Steward said Wildcat spoke at K-State last year and was invited back because of his perspective.

"I would definitely encourage people to attend. It is terribly interesting and the timely prospective he gives he speaks from a different point of view most know at K-State. These types of views need to be heard more often," she said.

A luncheon is to follow the presentation.

"Last year people were so interested in what he had to say that we went on and treated everyone to lunch. This allowed us to discuss for a while longer, and we paid, we plan on doing it again this year," Steward said.

U.S. military reports escalation of attacks

By Robert H. Reid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Insurgents destroyed an American tank north of Baghdad, killing two U.S. soldiers and wounding seven Ukrainians in the first ambush against the multinational force patrolling central Iraq, officials said Wednesday. The attacks were part of a dramatic upsurge in recent days.

U.S. policy in Iraq suffered another setback when the international Red Cross announced it was reducing its international staff in the country, two days after a deadly suicide car bombing at its Baghdad headquarters. The humanitarian group Medecins Sans Frontieres, or Doctors Without Borders, also announced it had pulled out workers.

Secretary of State Colin Powell had urged the Red Cross and other nongovernment organizations to stay in Iraq because "if they are driven out, then the terrorists win."

The Iraqi Governing Council blamed the upsurge on foreign fighters. The council on Wednesday called on neighboring countries to crack down on infiltrators crossing into Iraq and provide Iraqi authorities with information about former regime figures who may be hiding on their soil, according to a statement carried by the Arabic language television statement Al-Jazeera.

The latest attacks – 233 over the last seven days according to the U.S. military – have driven the combat death toll during the occupation above the number killed before President Bush declared an end to active combat on May 1.

Recent deaths brought the number of American soldiers killed by hostile fire since May 1 to 117. A total of 114 U.S. soldiers were killed between the start of the war March 20 and the end of April.

Number of dead at 20 in California wildfires

By Andrew Bridges

LAKE ARROWHEAD, Calif. – Firefighters struggled desperately Wednesday to save emptied-out resort towns in Southern California's San Bernardino Mountains as 200-foot walls of flame engulfed dead and dried-out trees.

In San Diego County, the state's largest fire claimed another victim when a firefighting crew was overcome by flames. Firefighter Steven Rucker, 38, was killed while trying to save a home near Wynola. Three others were injured.

It marked the first firefighter death since the series of blazes began last week.

"It just swept right over them. They probably didn't have time to get out of the way," San Diego County Sheriff's Sgt. Conrad Grayson said.

The death toll later reached 20 after authorities said two people were found dead Wednesday on an Indian reservation as the result of the same San Diego County fire.

In the San Bernardino Mountains east of Los Angeles, the hot, dry Santa Ana winds from the desert that had been whipping the fires into raging infernos eased Wednesday. But they gave way to stiff breezes off the ocean that pushed the flames up the canyon walls around evacuated mountain enclaves like Lake Arrowhead and Big Bear _ towns that are among Southern California's most popular mountain playgrounds.

By early afternoon, homes were burning in the mountain community of CedarPines Park. The flames were expected to hit the town of Running Springs after crews weren't able to set backfires along a highway to protect the town. The fires also swept over mountain tops, forcing evacuations in parts of the high desert town of Hesperia.

"There's fire on so many fronts, it's not even manageable at this point," said Chris Cade, a fire prevention technician with the U.S. Forest Service, as he watched a pillar of smoke he estimated at 9,000 feet rise into a hazy sky thick with ash. "I am at a loss what you can do about it."

The fires have burned more than 620,000 acres and destroyed 2,100 homes.

Women's Center to offer chocolate prizes at open house

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chocolate might not be a food group, but Mary Todd, assistant director of the Women's Center, thinks everybody needs it.

"We're going to have some games of skill and some games of chance, and people can win chocolate. One game will be to see who can keep a hula hoop going the longest," Todd said. "We'll have all types of chocolate – Snickers, Three Musketeers, Reese's. We have tiny, medium and large chocolate bars."

The open house will be on the lawn outside Holton Hall, where the Women's Center is located. Todd said the center has had open houses in the past, but never one outside.

"It's partly a celebration of the fall weather that we're having," she said. "The students are all out, and we want people to see where we're located. Holton Hall is located at a nice intersection on campus."

Todd said students from the Proactive Educators for the Elimination of Rape and Sexual Violence course will be helping with the open house.

"There will be students from PEERS maning and womaning tables outside," she said. "I hope people will see the tables and hear music from inside Holton Hall and stop by."

Informational flyers and brochures will be available about healthy relationships, positive intimacy, body image, self-esteem and people tapping into their own strengths, Todd said. There will also be other snacks such as popcorn, cider and peanuts.

Ulysses Gonzalas, a local karate instructor, will demonstrate self-defense moves for those who would like to learn, Todd said. He will also have sign-ups for his self-defense classes.

"We also have some very cool bookmarks and posters we'll be giving away. Someone might dress up as Jackie Onassis, too," Todd said. "I hope people stop by to have a fun time, win some chocolate, watch a karate expert show some self-defense moves, listen to some music and take a break in the middle of the day."

Although the open house is today, Todd said people are always welcome in the center.

"Our doors are always open, and people can always stop in," she said. "We always have time to let people know what we're about. We always want to be available to victims of sexual assault. We have information relating to nonviolence and social justice."

Todd said the center has tapes and books that can be checked out by students. They also have a comprehensive list of Internet resources.

Famous comedy troupe The Second City hits McCain with improvisational show

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

McCain Auditorium will be full of laughter tonight when The Second City's National Touring Company performs as part of its 45th anniversary tour.

"Midterms are looming and this show will provide a great study break," said Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain Auditorium. "It'll relieve stress. Students will be able to forget about school and laugh."

Most people have seen a play or a musical, but not as many people have seen live comedy, Jackson said.

"With 'The Sound of Music,' you know the Von Trapp family will be safe, but Second City includes a lot of audience participation. They make it up as they go along and every show is different," he said. "They could bomb or could be amazing."

This is the third time the Second City troupe has performed as part of the McCain performance series.

The other two performances were in 2000 and 2001. The troupe did not come to Manhattan last year because of scheduling conflicts.

"You have to sign up early to get these folks, because they go to hundreds of college campuses a year," Jackson said.

With famous alumni such as Bill Murray, Bonnie Hunt, Chris Farley, Julia Louis-Dreyfus, Jeremy Piven, George Wendt and Tim Meadows, Second City's touring company has become a spring board for success.

Despite so many "Saturday Night Live" cast members coming from Second City, Jackson insisted Second City is not of a lower quality than SNL, but rather the live version to SNL's TV show.

Because this is Second City's 45th anniversary tour, Jackson said the troupe will perform some of Second City's most popular skits. Many of these have been performed on Saturday Night Live by Second City alumni.

He said there is a staff of people who do extensive research about the campuses and communities before the troupe performs.

"It keeps them very sharp about what's going on," Jackson said. "They were here during the presidential elections and did a skit about ballot counting that was absolutely hysterical."

Sarah Bode, senior in theater, saw the Second City performance two years ago. She said she thought the show was between Saturday Night Live and "Whose Line is it Anyway?"

"You're never sure where the show is going to go," she said.

Bode said she doesn't plan to go into live comedy as a career, but still finds improv very helpful, using it to find her character for a show.

"A play might talk about a past event and the director will get the cast together and act out that event," Bode said.

Kate Anderson, theater professor, teaches the theater department's improvisation classes. She said improvisational comedy is not about standing up and trying to be funny, but giving up the funny to work with a group of people.

"The biggest rule is to say yes to anything, you can't do that in the real world because you would get into a lot of trouble if you did. Improvisation creates a safe environment," Anderson said.

Dixie Chicks songwriter to play Manhattan

By Matthew Webber
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Darrell Scott, who wrote the Dixie Chicks' songs "Long Time Gone" and "Heartbreak Town," is performing at the Manhattan Arts Center Saturday evening as part of the BirdHouse concert series.

Scott said his show should please anyone who is a fan of good songwriting. He described his own songs as stories.

"I think it should be an entertaining night," he said. "In some cases, maybe folks have heard some of these songs recorded by other people.

"I'd say if they like songs, that's pretty well what I'm about. It's totally about songs."

For his BirdHouse show, people should expect a "unique night," Scott said. He said he sometimes sings old Johnny Cash, Townes van Zandt and Hank Williams tunes in addition to his own. He also said he plays without a set list.

"Each performance has a one-off kind of quality to it," he said.

"I just kind of decide what the next song is somewhere between the ending of the other song. I just kind of follow what I feel like doing, or a song I haven't thought of in a long time.

"Playing live is all about being in the moment. That's what I like best. If you're not in the moment, it's really kind of lousy. It's the moment of the music. It's the moment when you can't take anything back, not like in the studio when you can always fix stuff."

Scott is hitting the road to support his new recording, "Theatre of the Unheard," the title of which suggests the general music-buying public hasn't heard of him.

Some of the right people have heard him, however. The Dixie Chicks, Garth Brooks, Patty Loveless and Darryl Worley have all sung songs he's written.

The Dixie Chicks have called Scott "one of the great writers of our time," according to a press release from Scott.

Penny Senften, the executive director of the arts center, said Scott's concert should be a typical BirdHouse series concert.

"It's an evening of great music," she said. "There's always just a terrific atmosphere, because the artists always connect really well with the audience. In our space, that works really well.

"We say it's an intimate listening environment, and it really is. You really feel you're right there with the artist, which makes it kind of different from listening in a big hall or something."

Senften said David Kamerer, the chair of the BirdHouse Committee, has booked many successful shows.

"He picks artists that are very, very good names or people he's heard whom he thinks are really good," she said.

"It's largely due to his skill at picking people that our BirdHouse Series is so successful. He just has a real flair for picking good artists who are also extremely personable. They're all just great people."

Sheriff received tips 2 years prior to Columbine shootings

By Colleen Slevin
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GOLDEN, Colo. – The two students who gunned down 12 schoolmates and a teacher at Columbine High bragged about making pipe bombs and said they were looking for a "ground zero" two years before the bloodbath – and authorities knew it, the sheriff said Wednesday.

Authorities have said they knew about violent rants by Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold in 1998, a year before the shootings, and that a search warrant was not acted upon.

Jefferson County Sheriff Ted Mink, who took office in July, said Wednesday someone had called the sheriff's office a year earlier, in 1997, to tip off authorities about a Web site run by Harris.

A deputy investigated the tip and forwarded a report and printouts from the Web site to a sheriff's investigator in charge of computer-related crimes, Mink said.

The investigation of the Web site apparently stopped there, Mink said. The report was not found until last week, when a deputy came upon it as he was leafing through a training manual, Mink said.

"Now our only problem is to find the place that will be 'ground zero,'" they say, according to the report.

Some families have been sharply critical of the sheriff's office and one of Mink's predecessors – Sheriff John Stone – for the handling of the Columbine investigation. They have accused authorities of ignoring or missing warning signs that Harris and Klebold planned to kill.

Sue Petrone, whose son, Daniel Rohrbough, was killed at Columbine, said she was astonished to see the year 1997 on the report.

"That's another chance that someone had to keep my son alive," she said.

Some details about the Web site were released immediately after the shootings, including threats of violence and boasts about the teenagers' ability to build pipe bombs.

Mink said he had asked Colorado Attorney General Ken Salazar to investigate why the 1997 report had not been included in the hundreds of pages of documents that were reviewed as part of the probe into the massacre.

"The obvious implication is that the sheriff's office had some knowledge of the activities of Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold in the years previous to the Columbine shootings," Mink said.

"It is difficult to believe this turn of events, and difficult to stand here and discuss them with you, but I feel it is the right thing to do."

Mink and Salazar met with families of the victims to discuss the report before it was released.

Arnold's visit marked concerns

By Beth Fouhy
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Congressional Republicans welcomed Arnold Schwarzenegger to Capitol Hill Wednesday with words of praise and plenty of stargazing for the governor-elect who delivered California from the Democrats.

The celluloid hero-turned-politician also had lunch with his Uncle Ted, better known in Washington as Democratic Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

Schwarzenegger's first official visit to the nation's capital – and the Republican-controlled Congress – was supposed to be a victory lap, but the wildfires devastating Southern California turned the trip into one part emergency mission, one part spectacle that electrified the Capitol's businesslike atmosphere.

As he moved along the marbled hallways, Schwarzenegger was trailed by an entourage that seemed more suited to a visiting head of state than to a political neophyte who hasn't been sworn into office. He was flanked by staff, a security detail, lawmakers and any number of curious onlookers. Several dozen reporters and as many as 20 television crews were there to greet him at each of his news conferences.

"He's much more impressive in person than in pictures," Rep. Bill Thomas, R-Calif., chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said of Schwarzenegger.

Reviewing the often chaotic scene in the Capitol, spokesman Rob Stutzman said Schwarzenegger was fully aware of the effect of his star power and he planned to put it to good use.

"The governor-elect understands what his political capital is," Stutzman said. "And one of the reasons I believe he will succeed is that he will appropriate it effectively."

Schwarzenegger began his day meeting with Michael Brown, the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and help for fire-scorched California was on the agenda. He also met with the House and Senate leadership; the California congressional delegation, including Democratic Sens. Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein; and Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham and Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta.

"I came basically to Washington to establish relationships and to make sure we are getting more federal money for California as I promised in my campaign," Schwarzenegger told reporters following a meeting with House Republicans. "But of course the recent events, the huge disastrous fires have changed my mission a little bit. I'm now looking for federal money for the people, the victims of the fire."

After the morning session at the Capitol, Schwarzenegger and his wife, Maria Shriver, joined Kennedy, a 41-year veteran of Congress and Massachusetts' senior senator, at the Willard Hotel for lunch.

"Arnold and I have been friends for many, many years, we've enjoyed a lot of good times, and members of our family look forward to that in the future," Kennedy said.

Weston Hall, a.k.a the Hulk, makes his way through a game at the children's carnival Wednesday at the K-State Student Union courtyard. The event, which gave children the chance to do everything from painting pumpkins to collecting candy, was put together by the Union Program Council.

STUDY ABROAD | Program unites community

"We need the support of the administration. That's probably the biggest thing," said Mary Beth Cook, graduate assistant in the Office of International Programs. "We need them pushing this as much as we are to new students coming in. We need them to say, 'You should study abroad.'"

O'Hara said it is even more important now for students to experience other parts of the world.

"We've seen the need to increase diversity at K-State. It's important for students to go to different parts of the world and be more well-rounded," he said. "It's crucial to the future of our nation."

Additional money – about $20,000 – will be used to serve international students who are studying at K-State. Students can arrange to have a van pick them up at the Kansas City International airport instead of having to pay for the Roadrunner shuttle service.

"We are working on that for semester break," Cook said. "I have received e-mails from over 60 people that are really interested, and I believe a lot more will come in after the schedule is finalized because some are waiting to get a ticket until they know."

The other service available to international students is a weekly trip to Dillons grocery store and Wal-Mart.

"We are using some of the money allocated out for a shuttle system to take them to get food and other necessities once a week," O'Hara said.

Cook, whose salary is funded from the tuition revenue, drives the 15-passenger van each week.

"Last Friday was the fourth week of it, so it is still new," Cook said. "I would say about eight to 10 students have used the shuttle each week. It's getting bigger each time."

In spring 2003, there were 1,020 international students enrolled at K-State. The tuition revenue, Cook said, supports these members of the K-State community.

"These students here are putting money into our economy and into our university. If they have a good experience while they are here, they are going to look back at K-State with a more positive view," she said. "For alumni, you are more likely to benefit from alumni in a way in the future.

"They bring diversity to the campus, and they want to interact with American students. There's a lot of them that don't get that opportunity because all they have is a bicycle or their feet. Taking care of students is an important thing."

Holland said the tuition money, although not immediately visible to all students, has created a better campus atmosphere.

"It has improved the quality of life for international students," he said. "We are creating higher morale among them, and they feel like the students care about them because they know the money comes from the students. It creates a greater sense of community."

VANIER | University accepting fund donations

Donations are currently being raised for the last three phases. In phases four and five, work will be done to some of the infrastructure and to the heating, ventilation and air conditioning systems. The visitors' locker room, the coaches locker room and K-State locker rooms will be overhauled along with Snyder's office and other offices in the building.

Thomas said the department doesn't have the three phases entirely mapped out because they are still raising money.

In the final phase, the north endzone of the stadium will be remodeled to include permanent seating.

"I refer to as a tiered landscape-type setting where we would carve out and then have areas where we could set some bleachers or pour some concrete," Weiser said. "We aren't sure, but that is probably going to be a $1 million to $2 million dollar project itself, so it is going to take us some time to generate and find those kinds of gifts."

At the beginning, all renovations were estimated to cost $2.8 million, but with the last three phases still out for estimation the cost could change, Thomas said.

Snyder said the renovations are only going to benefit the program.

"It's the best thing for our youngsters and it will benefit them in the future, which is why we are doing it," he said. "The only thing is right now is it's a little distracting with all the noises."

VOLLEYBALL | Wildcats claim victory over KU

Fritz said that while a team's vulnerability is why matches are played, consistency is how matches are won.

"There will always be teams that get hot," Fritz said.

"But it will be your ability to be good over time that will win the match. I didn't actually think we were playing particularly poor in games one and two. I thought they were playing very, very well.

"I think we learned that we've got the confidence in our ability to win those matches, those tight ones. Down the road, that will be important."

TIPS | Appearance is everything for restaurant staff

"They're taught the basics," Michael Gassmann, co-manager of Chili's said. "They're taught on taking orders, how to up-sale, liquor knowledge and anything that would help them increase sales."

Gassmann said that most of the time, higher sales result in higher tips.

Showing off the pearly whites and personal flair, though, are not the only ways to win over customers.

Cheryl Newman, waitress, manager and bartender at Carlos O'Kelly's, said a suitable appearance also tends to help customers' tip-giving.

"I think if you're sloppy or dirty, you tend to make less tips," Newman said.

At Carlos O'Kelly's, Newman said there is a policy against certain appearances, such as nose rings, extreme colored hair, and large visible tattoos.

For some restaurants, Beninga said, higher tips tend to vary depending on waiter's or waitresses' section.

Beninga said that at Little Apple Brewing Co., those waiters' and waitresses who have worked at the restaurant the longest tend to get stronger and larger sections, ultimately resulting in higher tips.

Nathan Whitney, bartender at Carlos O'Kelly's, said his job tends to have better tips than other positions at the restaurant.

One night shift alone can bring Whitney about $100 in tips.

In addition, Whitney said he also receives a portion of the restaurant's tip-out – about 1 percent of all wait sales for the evening.

While most restaurant workers said one gender is better than another at receiving tips, it does depend on the situation.

"Older gentlemen tend to like younger females, but younger college girls like the male bartenders to wait on them," Newman said.

"It goes both ways."

"With higher sales comes more money for tips," Beninga said.

Seventh-grader pulls gun on teacher, abducts classmate

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MARION, La. – A 14-year-old boy brought a semiautomatic pistol to school on Wednesday, robbed his teacher of his car keys and took a classmate hostage before leading deputies on a high-speed chase.

Police said the SUV with both boys inside was stopped without incident within 20 minutes, after a chase through northern Louisiana and southern Arkansas reaching speeds up to 90 mph.

The teen, whose name was not released, was arrested in Arkansas, where he was being held until Louisiana authorities could question him. He waived extradition at a hearing in El Dorado, Ark.

"There's no rhyme nor reason nor anything that goes together on it," Union Parish Sheriff's spokesman Carlton White said.

Police and school officials at Marion High said the seventh-grader brought the gun into class in a backpack and apparently hadn't had any earlier problems with the teacher or 12-year-old boy he abducted.

Authorities said the boy pulled out the gun during the day's first class, forcing the teacher to hand over the keys to his 1997 GMC Jimmy.

Teachers "went into emergency procedure ...and, gathered the children together" immediately after the holdup, school superintendent Tom Snell said.

The boy drove into Arkansas and sped away when a deputy tried to stop him, police said. He was stopped at the state line when deputies created a roadblock.

ENROLLMENT | New policies should help improve waiting system

They then chose to make it one of their campaign initiatives to help alleviate the burden that students were experiencing, he said.

Stryker said students will commonly enroll in up to 30 hours, because they don't know how their schedules will work in the long run, and then drop the classes they don't need.

"We know that this has been a common occurrence," Stryker said, "but we've heard of a worse case scenario where somebody once enrolled in seventy-five hours."

Stryker said he thinks the changes in enrollment procedures will not completely solve the problem, but they are a step in the right direction.

Sanders said he would like to see improvements in the wait listing system as well, so that once a class fills, the wait lists are handled manually by the department.

"We've got to come up with an equitable way for students to enroll in the courses that they need," Sanders said, "anything else and we're letting our students down."

Fees help diversity programs

Committee receives 48 proposals for programs

Enhancing K-State

Students will be asked to consider what services they want to see continue with next year's tuition increase. Five percent of tuition revenue is designated for student-centered enhancements, which are recommended by the Student Senate academic affairs and executive committees and approved by university administration.

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuition revenue isn't improving only students' academic education but also their ability to function in a global society.

The Diversity Programming Committee, which received $100,000 in tuition money designated for student-centered enhancements, is in the process of allocating the money aimed to bring diverse speakers and artists to campus.

"There is everything from speakers to musicians to art exhibits to workshops for students," Julie Quackenbush, committee chair, said.

The committee received 48 proposals totaling more than $390,000. Multi-cultural organizations, as well as other registered student groups submitted program proposals, which must cost at least $3,000. The programs also must have no admission free.

"Right now we are just working on going through the requests and trying to finalize what will be most beneficial to students and what most students can attend," Jennifer Bakumenko, Chief of Staff said.

Bakumenko said the original plan was to offer a spring deadline for additional requests, but with the number of proposals already turned in, that deadline will not be offered.

"Due to the large number of requests and the large amounts some have requested, we can't do that," she said. "We are trying to sift through. We are just trying to choose the ones that are most educational and beneficial to students, as well as providing a range of the types of diversity and different types of presentations."

Trick-or-treaters meet men's, women's basketball players

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Strawberry Shortcake, a skunk, a man who'd been blown away in the wind, a witch and an airplane pilot stepped onto the court with the entire men's and women's basketball teams at the conclusion of Fright Night.

The annual Fright Night, dubbed "Willie's House of Fun," returned for the eighth consecutive year last night at Bramlage Coliseum.

Brett Foltz, senior in business administration and student intern for the athletic department, said it was the basketball teams' idea to include children in their first introduction to the K-State community.

"It was the men's and women's basketball teams' idea to do something for the kids and for the community. There are a lot of other basketball teams doing Midnight Madness about this time of year, and they thought it would be good to include Halloween in the theme," Foltz said.

The basketball teams signed autographs for the trick-or-treaters and then were introduced onto the court, sans costumes.

Rachel Carter, senior in elementary education, said she did not expect to see a Christmas tree so soon this year.

"The neatest costume tonight was this Christmas tree. I didn't expect it all," Carter said.

Carter was at Fright Night to hand out candy to children. She was with the Kappa Delta Pi education honor society. The theme for their booth was a slumber party.

"We wanted something that was fun but still easy enough to throw together," Carter said. "I think the kids liked it fine."

"He is my favorite cartoon character," Gehrt said.

"Willie's House of Fun" had more than cartoon characters visiting Thursday night. Jessica Hudson, third-grader at Marlatt Elementary School, was dressed as Sacajawea.

"We did a report on her in my third-grade class, and I thought she was fun to learn about, so I dressed up like her," Hudson said.

Student Senate tables resolution on mayor's marriage proposal

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senators did not vote on a resolution stating concern of Mayor Mark Taussig's marriage proclamation at Thursday's Senate meeting.

The resolution, introduced at last week's meeting, stated that the mayor's proclamation "is an assault on the basic human rights and dignity of many members of the Manhattan community." Senators were supposed to vote on the resolution Thursday but did not because the Governmental Relations Committee has not reviewed it.

In other news, Senators passed a resolution stating support for those involved in organizing the 2003 Pack the Library Rally for Higher Education, which will be 7 p.m. Nov. 4 at Hale Library. The resolution also stated encouragement for all K-State students to attend the event.

The second annual rally is a chance for students to speak up about tuition increases. Students will write letters to legislators expressing concern about budget issues.

"It's hard to make a difference," Seth Bridge, Governmental Relations Chair, said. "This event provides a framework for students at K-State to make a difference. We need students there to make this a success."

Bridge said students who are interested in playing a vital role in this year's rally are more than welcome to attend the work session at 8 p.m. Monday. They will be organizing the letter-writing campaign outside the office of Student Activities and Services in the Union Courtyard.

K-State's budget

2001-2002	$167.5 million	$54.6 million	$486 million	22,396
2002-2003	$164.7 million	$67.9 million	$520.9 million	22,762
2003-2004	$157.7 million	$84.1 million	$531.7 million	23,050

Source: Bill Muir

Budget includes K-State main campus (including the College of Technology and Aviation), Veterinary Medical Center and Research and Extension.

Student Body President John O'Hara said he agreed it is important for students to attend the rally because the state has decreased the amount of money allotted to higher education.

"The state of Kansas made a promise three years ago to fund higher education, and they have not upheld that promise," he said.

O'Hara said the state promised to continue funding at a certain level so that institutions could increase their tuition to increase the quality of education. It is difficult to increase quality at K-State while the amount of money the university receives is decreasing, he said.

ROSIE O'DONNELL IN COURT OVER DEMISE OF MAGAZINE

Lawyers for Rosie O'Donnell and the publisher of her now-defunct magazine, Rosie, squared off in court Thursday, each charging the other with destroying the publication by seeking complete control.

"Ms. O'Donnell walked away from the magazine, causing it to shut down in its second year of publication and causing hundreds of people to lose jobs and Gruner + Jahr to lose millions of dollars," Martin Hyman, lawyer for publisher Gruner + Jahr USA, said in opening statements in a Manhattan courtroom.

The magazine, launched in 2001, folded soon after O'Donnell resigned in September 2002. G+J is seeking $100 million from O'Donnell; she asks $125 million in a countersuit.

He accuses Moore of libel, defamation of character, invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress. His lawyer is asking for a jury trial and damages ranging from $10 million to $20 million on each of nine counts, the Detroit Free Press reported.

Mail delivery for halls to resume Saturday

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although last Saturday the residence halls did not receive mail, that won't be the story this Saturday.

After the Manhattan post office received many calls and online complaints about the halt of delivery last Saturday, they decided to resume delivery to the residence halls this Saturday.

Derek Jackson, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services, said that early in the semester the post office had contacted him with concerns about delivering mail on Saturdays.

"They told us early in the year that they were having trouble getting mail carriers to deliver on Saturdays because of the games," Jackson said. "It was really hit and miss with delivery on Saturdays early in the semester."

Cary Holcomb, delivery supervisor at the Manhattan Post Office, said the main reason the post office made the decision to stop delivery on Saturdays was a lack of manpower.

"We have about 50 people to cover 60 positions," Holcomb said. "We are understaffed because we have some individuals that are on permanent or extended sick leave because of injuries on the job. We've had two people recently retire and have not been able to replace them yet."

Holcomb said the Post Master, Stephanie Walton, contacted Jackson to discuss possible solutions to this problem, but that their call was never returned.

However, Jackson said he did talk to Walton and said he felt he didn't have much of a choice in the matter.

"On the 17th of October, the post master called and said we'd no longer receive mail on Saturdays – that they were going to treat us like a business. I didn't really have any choice – this is the federal government – so I just said 'OK' and made the announcement."

Perhaps in this situation, only one thing is clear – residence hall members can thank their hallmates who called in to complain for the resumed delivery on Saturdays. At least for now.

Companies set collective sights on Riley County for wind farm

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The wind farm industry has taken interest in Kansas, the state that produces large wind gusts year round, including Riley County.

The American Wind Energy Association ranks Kansas third in the United States for having strong wind potential.

Wind farms already have been established throughout the state. In June 1999, Western Resources set up wind turbines in St. Mary's. Two years later, in December 2001, the Gray County Wind Farm was established in Montezuma, Kan, according to the Kansas Wind Energy Projects Web site.

Now, the California company Orion – among others – has taken interest in Riley County land.

Its interest, however, is only one step in a line of many.

"This company approached us about a year ago," said Monty Wedel, director of planning and development for Riley County. "They said they were putting up a test tower at the site they were interested in, and we got interested in looking into it at that time."

Riley County Commissioners voted Thursday to adopt a six-month moratorium on all wind farm proposals, which means it can be another half-year until Orion or other companies will submit applications to build a wind farm in the county.

Wedel said the moratorium allows county officials to revise regulations for zoning, as well as include performance standards for the interested company.

"We have decided to adopt some different regulations to make sure that we have an adequate review," Wedel said. "We've been drafting and thinking ahead about this sort of possibility for quite some time."

Though a proposal has not been set, the question still remains as to whether or a wind farm would be suitable in Riley County.

News update
Riley County wind farms

What's happening
Some state officials like the idea, which would prevent the state from buying out-of-state resources. Others criticize the project, saying the focus should be on protecting the Flint Hills.

In next week's Collegian
See how K-State is getting involved with the wind energy issue as well as more details involving the wind farm debate.

HOW IT WORKS

David Johnson, vice president of engineering and research at Pinnacle Technology, a product development company in Lawrence, said the basic idea of a wind farm can be compared to water flowing down a river.

"If you think of water flowing down the river, then put a wheel down it, the water will make the wheel turn," Johnson said. "For wind, if you put a big propeller up in the air, the wind will cause the propeller to rotate."

Johnson said large wind farms, such as the one in Montezuma, tend to have very long blades and generate power the same way in a coal plant. Instead of burning fossil fuels, though, the energy comes from the wind.

A normal wind farm generates 50 to 100 megawatts of power. A wind farm must also have a certain set of characteristics in order to produce adequate wind energy.

Jerry Lonergan, former director of Kansas Electric Utilities Research Program, said good wind resources have a steady wind and are close to transmission lines, where the energy is passed through.

Wedel said a transmission line in Riley County runs along Interstate 77, which is the company's prospective location.

Johnson said it is also important to keep in mind protected areas of land – such as the Flint Hills region.

"Unfortunately in the eastern part of the state where you have good wind resource and access, there are also a lot of protected areas," Johnson said.

BLOWING IN THE WIND

Debates have been surrounding the Riley County wind farm issue – namely among the county commissioners.

"Both sides feel very strong," Al Johnson, county commissioner, said.

Johnson said he is strongly in favor of looking at what wind can do to solve America's energy problem. However, he said a strong educational program is needed to present each side.

"I think that education can move mountains," Johnson said. "Not only in Riley County, but throughout the state of Kansas."

County commissioner Mike Kearns said he has been a proponent of the moratorium for some time.

Kearns said he is not against wind farms or the energy that it brings, but because the issue of wind farm development and placement in the county is of long-term and irreversible consequence.

"All facets of the issue must be given adequate study and thought," Kearns said.

Lonergan said Kansas wind farms provide a number of benefits to the state.

"You're using electricity from wind farms in Kansas which means you're using wind resource in Kansas," Lonergan said. "It eliminates buying out of state products."

Johnson said that although questions arise, the result comes down to one thing.

"The issues are coming down to politics than economic viability of the wind farmers."

Wildfires help logging legislation as government allocates funds to fight blaze

By H. Josef Hebert
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Against the backdrop of raging wildfires in the West, the Senate approved a forest management plan late Thursday that would allow expanded tree thinning on 20 million acres of federal land to reduce the risk of fires.

Meanwhile, the House approved a record $2.9 billion for firefighting and fire protection in federal forests as part of a $20.2 billion spending bill for the Interior Department.

The congressional debate over the forest bill and the firefighting money took on urgency because of the devastating wildfires that this week have destroyed more than 2,600 homes and blackened 730,000 acres across southern California.

"There is a tremendous lesson in these fires. That the land has to be managed," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., a leading co-sponsor of the compromise forest bill. The Senate approved it by a vote of 80-14.

The compromise bill must now be merged with legislation passed by the House in May, which would allow more aggressive and more wide spread tree cutting than approved by the Senate.

The legislation, a modified version of President Bush's "healthy forest" initiative, calls for establishing expedited procedures for tree thinning on 20 million acres of federal forests that are especially susceptible to fire threat and in many cases are close to populated areas.

The bill would authorize, subject to future appropriations, $760 million a year for forest management, more than double current spending.

TO THE POINT

Money spent on diversity is a smart move

Tuition revenue that is used to enhance diversity on campus is money well spent.

It is important for students to have knowledge of other cultures in an increasingly global world. When we graduate, we will be expected to work with people who come from very different backgrounds and who live very different lifestyles.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Not all students have experience with diverse people, but some information and opportunities can be presented here on campus.

Student organizations now have money available to fund large-scale on-campus events which are open to the entire student body, free of charge.

Because a committee will review applications by organizations and because proposed programs must cost at least $3,000, we can be sure we will see quality events, and students' money is not being wasted.

These events will not be restricted to members of certain organizations, so all students are invited to benefit from learning about other cultures.

Our tuition money is funding these events, and we should all take advantage of this opportunity to learn about other cultures.

Life questions

Introspection is key to self improvement

Plato wisely commented that an unexamined life is not worth living, or at least he alluded to that. In the spirit of carpe diem, I began to ask myself some questions I found to be worth sharing. Perhaps, you too, will learn something.

TAMMY JO OSBORN

WHAT IF YOU DIED TONIGHT?

After I asked myself this question, I started writing letters to people who had made a difference in my life. I called up old friends, fostered closer relationships with my family and stopped rushing through life, but it didn't stop there.

I began to live that way every day, appreciating the little things because, in reality, that is all that we have. I am more confident now that I will leave this world without regrets than I have ever been.

WHAT IF YOU WERE NOT AFRAID OF BEING HURT OR REJECTED, OR EVEN DEATH?

When the fear of such issues is erased, people begin to have the courage to put their foot forward again, take another chance and grasp at what they never thought they might have.

For me, this meant taking the opportunity to study abroad next semester in Moscow. For you, it might be applying for that job or facing an enemy and finding a friend.

Who knows the limits of this new fearlessness?

WHAT IF YOU DID WHAT WAS RIGHT, EVEN IF YOU KNEW YOU WERE GOING TO LOSE SOMETHING AS A RESULT?

When put in a position to do what is right despite what others are telling us we should do or need to do, we can be trapped in a rut of conformation ... if we allow it.

The truth that better things usually result from following our own personal moral code provides little encouragement in the face of outside pressure and short-term satisfaction.

However, if we have the courage to take such actions repeatedly, the chaos that comes immediately after serves as a way for us to find out who we truly are, and provides satisfaction in the long term.

WHAT IF YOU COULD NEVER TALK, SEE OR HEAR AGAIN?

Few of us take time to observe and focus on the beauty around us – not just walking through campus and looking at the flowers or falling leaves, but a more intimate look at the petals, a sniff of the roses or taking in the intricacy of the lines on the leaves.

So, people might look at you weirdly, but perhaps they are jealous you know how to take a moment out of the rush around you to appreciate the senses you have.

WHAT IF LIFE WAS ALL ABOUT WHO YOU BECOME THROUGH SERVING OTHERS AND NOT WHAT YOU ARE?

The race to find our place in this world occurs in a whirlwind of unknowns, but if each of us truly realized the magnified satisfaction that comes from helping others to get where they need to be, there would less frustration and more happiness.

It is not a higher salary or a better position, a trophy spouse or a dream job. It is not waiting for the circumstances to change and make life "better." Instead, it is making the world around you a better place, and allowing circumstances to teach you only what they need to.

After all, we all have "little time" to spend on such philosophical wonderings, but this overused excuse does not make the questions or the need to examine them disappear. Instead, it multiplies our personal loss and keeps us from capturing our desire to seize the day.

So take some time to ponder.

Equestrian sport deserves respect

The more people I meet, the more I love my horse.

Bumper sticker phrase or not, it's how I feel about certain people I run into – especially those that can't accept equestrian sports as "real" sports.

LINDSEY JONES

I don't know how many times I've heard the line, "What do you mean, horseback riding's hard? The horse does everything and you just sit there."

At this point, I suppress an urge to grind my teeth vocally and don't suppress an urge to scowl. My impetus for this column itself came from a snide comment in the Fourum asking why equestrian girls get scholarships "when the horse does all the work."

It's the same with almost anyone who doesn't know the sport intimately. How can sitting on the back of a horse who takes you for a joyride be that difficult? Well, I'll tell you.

Riding burns about 350 calories per hour, and several different muscles are taxed in just staying on top.

One hour of riding, including trotting and cantering, amounts to a five-mile jog or bicycling 10 miles, not to mention the additional 150–200 calories you'll burn in the half hour it takes to groom and saddle your horse.

Quadriceps, hamstrings and adductor muscles of new riders begin to burn after just a few minutes, leaving the newbie bowlegged and feeling like spaghetti after a scant 30-minute ride. Back and stomach muscles contract against the movement of the horse to maintain balance. It's not as easy as it looks.

Mounting is no easy task, either. Try hopping on something that's taller than you at its shoulder – and that doesn't want to stand still – and you'll quickly learn the benefits of agility, strength and flexibility.

So a new rider, after much grunting and huffing, plops like a sack of laundry onto the back of the horse. Instantly, it's not just about you anymore. You're on another living creature, who definitely has a mind of its own.

Depending upon the horse, a rider's first experience can be thrilling or terrifying. The first horse I rode stepped on my foot before I even got on.

Some horses, however, sense the ignorance of their cargo and are kind enough to acquiesce to the situation. They take the uncomfortable imbalance, jerking of reins, flailing legs and unsteady seat in stride.

Horses definitely are not stupid. They have people figured out even before they get on. You just pray you get the sweet-tempered ones to begin with.

As for competition, that's a whole other world. The women on the equestrian team work their butts off in weekly practice in order to prepare for meets.

In addition to at least two hours of grueling riding lessons per week – no stirrups, two-point for ages, posting without stirrups and countless other difficult exercises – the girls also lift weights and train twice a week and most do aerobic exercise.

It's not just for kicks – as a rider, you need to be fit. At away competitions, the equestrian team has to ride the host team's horses, who they've never even seen before. The girls quickly learn how to deal with strange horses that can be spooky, quirky or just generally hard to ride.

Now, I'm not trying to dissuade anyone from riding at all. On the contrary, it's changed my life infinitely for the better, and I wouldn't be half the person I am if I hadn't become involved with horses.

I just want to raise awareness that riding does indeed take not just brawn and skill, but brains as well. Even if you are an experienced rider, you have to be pretty clever to negotiate a horse you've never seen before over a twisting course of jumps without having a clue to his personality.

So, this is for all those people who think riding is just a laidback, undemanding joke. I dare you to look up a local riding stable and take just one hourlong lesson.

Then write me and let me know how easy it was.

Fourum prompts review

ANDREW LAWSON

First, I'd like to apologize to my loyal readers – all three of you – who were eagerly anticipating my juicy analysis of the reconstruction efforts in Iraq.

Maybe I'll write about that someday, but something more important came up just yesterday morning.

You see, every day I check the Fourum, and every day I'm a little more disappointed. The calls just get progressively more inane and vulgar.

Thursday morning, though, was an all-time low. I swear, it amazes me how depraved certain individuals can get when they know they can say anything without fear of reprisal, thanks to the easily-abused gift of anonymity.

This is not a column about Aubrey Christine Owen and her baby. I don't even want to touch that topic.

This is a column about the individuals who, apparently blessed by a lack of any moral compunction of basic decency, thought it would be amusing to call in jokes about Owen's alleged crime, as if I would ever print such filth.

I thought I could handle anything when I took this job.

Sexually explicit comments? No problem.

Forty-five-second recorded orgasms and other bodily noises? Setting aside the problem of how to type them out, it's going to take a lot more than that to disturb me.

Racist, sexist, homophobic and otherwise offensive comments? I'm a male – I've probably heard them all before.

There has even been a man who called in while attempting suicide.

With these jokes, however, I have reached my breaking point. I would say the Fourum could not possibly get any lower, except that I have said this at least 50 times already this semester, and every time I have been proved wrong.

Is there nothing taboo in our society anymore? Is there no governing function in the human brain that, no matter the amount of alcohol present in one's system, will override at least some of the most despicable comments that come to mind?

I really am beginning to wonder. It is no exaggeration on my part to say I have heard some of the darkest parts of humanity recorded on the Audix voice mail system.

For the first time in my memory, editors actually have discussed limiting or even eliminating the Fourum. That such a proposition has even been thought about, despite the feature's immense popularity, should convey the gravity of the situation, if nothing else I have written makes that impression.

At the risk of sounding juvenile, I think that would be a loss to the Collegian, the student body and the K-State family as a whole.

I have always enjoyed reading the Fourum, before I ever started working for this paper. In its better days, it was an eclectic mix of amusing witticisms, slightly crude yet subtle observations and actual debate over current events.

I am no prude, but likewise, I maintain some basic standards that decent humans should aspire to adhere. The Fourum is beginning to fall short of even these fundamental expectations.

Just as Machiavelli ended "The Prince" with an "an exhortation to liberate Italy from the barbarians," I will leave you with my exhortation.

I'm not asking Fourum callers to call in more erudite or more sophisticated comments.

I'm simply requesting a little common sense. Some of the things I've heard could get you fired or sued. Remember, anonymity is a privilege, not a right.

Here's my challenge: If you would be unwilling to attach your name or face to your comment, for God's sake, don't call it in.

As I was recording a new greeting for the Fourum on Wednesday, one of my line artists joked I should say, "This is the Kansas State Collegian Campus Fourum, the repository for all the excrement spewing forth from your mouth."

Sadly, if things don't improve, I might have to take his advice.

TO THE POINT

Study abroad funding misunderstood

Editor,

I would like to take an opportunity to clarify some of the misleading statements in the Collegian's editorial opinion "Students should not have to pay for others to take college classes abroad."

As my administration authored the Global Education Initiative, it was never stated or written at any point that the initiative should attempt to give scholarship support to every student taking courses abroad.

The initiative did aim to encourage participation in new areas, help financially needy students with an interest in international programs and show student commitment to the importance of international education.

Contrary to what the editorial board stated, the tuition revenue was never intended to fund the goal entirely, and the editorial should be corrected so as to not mislead the public. Creating 1,000 scholarships definitely would require great support from the alumni and friends of K-State.

President Jon Wefald's 10 percent goal in support of the initiative should be applauded. His focus now should be on establishing an international legacy at K-State, ensuring that the 10 percent goal is realized and exceeded.

The editorial does raise a point that should have been explained further, namely, "Why should K-State students pay for others to go to school, regardless of the location?"

With the passage of the initiative, K-State students do show a small amount of financial support for international education, but K-State students pay for others to go to school right here at home also.

In fiscal year 2004, K-State tuition increases directed nearly 25 percent of the additional revenue – $2,608,000 – to be given to students with financial need. Over 2,000 students benefit from "tuition waivers."

Yet attacking this allocation of tuition waivers is not warranted. These students come to K-State with low expected family contributions and may be denied access to a college education without the financial support of tuition waivers.

The facts speak for themselves. As a student, I pay part of that $2,608,000 for K-Staters to study here. I pay less than 3 percent of that total for K-Staters to gain relevant cultural skills and promote K-State abroad.

Efforts in international education are priceless and they are well worth the small investment that students make each year.

SGA resolution should be denied

Editor,

I would like to pinpoint one of the main reasons homosexual rights activists clash with the conservatives in the political realm.

It seems much of the power behind homosexual rights arguments, such as the drive to have SGA officially reject the mayor's marriage proclamation, is based on the idea that homosexuals were born as such – when they grew up, they realized they were homosexual, and now they cannot do anything about it.

If this is correct, it is definitely an injustice for any government or organization to deprive them of rights that are related to sexual orientation.

If this claim is still used today, and it does seem apparent in a lot of the language used in recent letters to the editor, then the supporters of this view should make more effort to teach adults about the evidence behind the claim.

I have not heard any scientific evidence proving homosexuals are born as such. If there is such evidence, there is obviously a lack of awareness about it in the adult public.

There is no variable at birth that obviously points to a homosexual nature.

If this claim is not true, the arguments of homosexual rights activists are reduced to the language of preference.

Governments and organizations do not have the responsibility to cater to each preference.

I encourage SGA to deny the latest action to denounce the marriage proclamation.

Leon letter lacks research, makes excuses

Editor,

This is in response to the letter that was posted last Friday called "Partial-birth abortion bill interferes with women's rights."

I found it rather ridiculous and one-sided because it lacked much of the truth. I think it would be wise for people to first get all of the facts before stating their opinions, especially when the issue concerns the whole nation.

Allow me to clarify that this bill isn't "attacking" abortion in its entirety, but a certain procedure that has, for a long time, been a part of the unit of abortion. In my opinion, and obviously many others', the procedure is highly barbaric and should have never been allowed anyway.

I find it surprising that doctors actually did this. The procedure entails that the doctor partially remove the fetus from the body of the mother, crush its skull to kill the brain, then extract the rest of the fetus' body.

There has to be a less horrific way to abort. Think about it – it might be hard enough for a mother to go through the process of abortion. How would you think she'd feel if she knew the fetus was aborted by having its head bashed in? How would you feel knowing that nifty piece of information?

Also, I'd like to address the amount of time a woman will have to decide whether she wants to have a child. Carolina Leon makes it seem like a pregnant woman doesn't have enough time to make a decision – a perfect strategy to persuade people, by the way.

She states that a woman has a "measly" 12 weeks to decide. That's equivalent to three months, or one season.

That is enough time to think about what her plans are for the future and how a baby will affect those plans, whether she's financially able to support the child as well as herself and whether she has a stable enough lifestyle to raise a child.

If she believes she doesn't have enough time, then it could only mean she doesn't think the decision of whether to abort is one of the hardest decisions she'll ever have to make in her life.

She could either be too lazy to think about it, or her life is just so busy that she couldn't possibly deal with her pregnancy at the moment.

Regardless, a pregnant woman will have more than enough time to sit down and handle the situation that will undoubtedly change her life. How she uses the time is up to her.

Yes, it is true that the bill will make partial birth abortions illegal, and if any doctor were to perform that procedure, he or she will face a fine and up to two years in jail. However, every bill has an exception and this one is no different.

The ban does not apply if the mother's health is at risk and therefore the procedure must be done in order to save her life. So, Leon was indeed wrong to say that the bill does not take the mother's health into consideration.

Our government isn't as foolish as some people would like to believe. They make sure to take all possibilities into account.

There are more than 300 congressmen who came together and discussed this issue. I'm pretty sure at least one of them thought about the mother and brought it to everyone's attention. Why else would that statement be written in the bill?

Again, I would like to advise people to please get the whole truth before taking a stand on an issue. If you don't, you'll just be misleading the people who would actually take the time to read your opinion.

The Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act isn't attacking abortion – it is attacking a barbaric medical procedure that no one should have to endure. Besides, whether we like it or not, the act will be signed by the president, if it hasn't been already.

So no matter how much we talk about it or insult it, nothing will change the inevitable outcome.

Top 10 scariest people in sports

LOUIE NOVAK

Anyone who knows me is aware that I absolutely love Oct. 31.

Every other holiday combined doesn't even compete with Halloween.

In honor of today, I have compiled my own personal top 10 list, titled "Louie Novak's top 10 scariest people in all of sports."

10. KYLE TURLEY- TACKLE FOR THE ST. LOUIS RAMS

The former New Orleans Saint is famous for ripping the helmet off of an opponent and tossing it down the field.

I fear this man. Take one look at him and you will see what I am talking about. It doesn't take a whole lot to get this guy to flip out, and to me, that is pretty darn scary.

9. BEN WALLACE- FORWARD/CENTER DETROIT PISTONS

Do you need glass cleaned or shots blocked? If you do, Wallace is your man.

The 6-foot-9, 240-pound beast averages 6.9 points, 15.4 rebounds, and 3.2 blocks per game. However, that is not the reason he is No. 9 on my list.

Have you ever looked at this guy?

Seriously, when he has his afro all puffed out and that intense look in his eyes, whoa nelly! I would hate to see him while walking alone down a dark alley.

8. ROGER CLEMENS- FORMER PITCHER FOR THE NEW YORK YANKEES

Although Roger Clemens retired after the Yankees' World Series loss to the Florida Marlins, Clemens was the most feared pitcher in baseball.

If you weren't careful, Clemens would take your head off with a high fastball, and if that didn't work, he would throw broken bat pieces and shout curse words at you.

The man had over 300 wins, 4,099 strikeouts, and a career earned run average of 3.19. Above all else, the guy was built like a brick poo house!

7. PAT SUMMITT- HEAD COACH OF THE TENNESSEE LADY VOLUNTEERS

Summitt has compiled six NCAA titles and 22 Southeastern Conference tournament and regular season championships.

The way I see her, Summitt is a drill sergeant and looks like a machine. I also am pretty confident that deep down, there is a man in her just screaming to get out.

6. ANYONE IN THE WNBA

Did you read my column about the league?

Well, if you did, you should understand why I am a little frightened by those ladies.

Lucky for me, with their talent, they would probably miss.

5. BOBBY KNIGHT- HEAD COACH OF THE TEXAS TECH RED RAIDERS

The man known as The General has won more than 800 games and three national championships.

This incident, along with several others, resulted in his dismissal from Indiana University.

I have the utmost respect for Knight, but if he yelled at me, I guarantee that I would pee my pants.

4. RAY LEWIS- LINEBACKER FOR THE BALTIMORE RAVENS

The 28-year-old, 6-foot-1, 245-pound linebacker has over 1,000 tackles, 20 sacks and 15 interceptions in his career.

On the field he is a mad man, and off the field he gained infamy through his much publicized murder case in Atlanta after the 2000 Super Bowl.

Forgive me if I am a little hesitant to believe he was an innocent bystander that night who was at the wrong place at the wrong time.

Cross country teams look to excel

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It started with the summer workouts. Then there were the intense practices and invitationals.

Now, it all comes together for the K-State cross country teams.

For Coach Randy Cole, the championships are a culmination of the teams' efforts over the past several months.

"I look at it as a celebration of all our hard work we've put in this season," Cole said. "It's a chance to showcase the combination of guts and intelligence we've developed this year."

Action begins with the men's 8,000-meter race at 9 a.m. and the women following at 10 a.m. with their 6,000-meter race.

At the invitational, Chesang ran the second-fastest 10,000 meter race in K-State history, while Kipchumba achieved the eighth spot on the all-time record list.

"I feel happy that my hard work is paying off, and I feel fresh going into this week's race," said Chesang, who finished seventh overall at last year's conference championships.

Today also marks the return of freshman Stefanie Murer for the women's team. In a strategic move, Cole sat Murer out of the Chile Pepper race so she could be well-rested and in peak condition for today's meet.

Personal and team records have been rewritten in the past 48 hours for the K-State volleyball team, and the next match is a little more than a day away.

After Wednesday's 3-2 thriller in Lawrence, senior middle blocker Lauren Goehring had only three words to describe what the Cats needed to do to continue winning.

"Keep playing well," she said.

The conference-leading No. 7-ranked Cats (21-3, 11-1) take their nine-match win streak into Boulder, Colo., to take on the Buffaloes (15-7, 7-5) at 8 Saturday night.

Although K-State swept the Buffs 3-0 on Oct. 18 in Ahearn Field House, Coach Suzie Fritz said the latter half of the Big 12 schedule always has opponents ready to go.

"You're more prepared, but so are they," she said. "You've been in that environment before. You have to win the ones you're supposed to win. You need to play well at home, and you've got to get some significant road wins which is probably the hardest task."

Colorado, coming off a 3-2 victory over Iowa State on Wednesday in Ames, Iowa, will be looking to extend its perfect record to 8-0 at the Coors Events Conference Center.

Leading the charge for the Cats will be Goehring, the Big 12's preseason Player of the Year pick.

Goehring, coming off a .485 hitting game in which she had 20 kills and 22 points, is fifth in the Big 12 in hitting percentage and eighth in blocks per game.

"I don't think she does make a lot of mistakes," Fritz said. "That's being a senior and being a very physical and talented athlete. She's been a rock for us from the very beginning. She's put this team on her back. It's very evident that she's a very, very good middle blocker."

Setting the pace will be junior setter Gabby Guerre, who moved into third place in all-time assists with 3,211 after collecting 76 of them against KU.

Laura Downey-Wallace also moved into second place all-time in career digs with 1,264.

Although Colorado has played against four top-25 teams this year, they have lost all four times. But Fritz said regardless of the opponent, K-State's improvements and adjustments are what is at stake during every game of every match.

"I think we're still learning that it doesn't matter who is on the other side of the net," Fritz said. "You're just trying to get more and more and more."

With only eight matches to go before the start of the NCAA tournament, Fritz said she is satisfied with

Column | Baylor Bears offer little bite for Cats

Joel Reichenberger doesn't think much of Baylor and what they bring to K-State this weekend, especially with the Cats playing their best football of the season in their last three games.

In fact, Reichenberger thinks some of the most inept football teams ever organized could knock off the Bears. Read who that might be, and why K-State will roll to a Homecoming win in an online exclusive at www.kstatecollegian.com.

Equestrian | Cats to Illinois to continue winning ways

K-State's Western team will attempt to build on the momentum gained from its first place finish at Southwest Missouri State when the Wildcats compete in a two-day Western show at Black Hawk College this weekend. The shows begin at 9 a.m. Saturday in Moline, Ill. with K-State showing at 1 p.m.

Erin Peery led K-State with wins in both Open Horsemanship and Open Reining at the Springfield, Mo. event, while seven other Wildcat riders took home first place finishes.

"Our team is riding really well right now," Coach Lindsay Breidenthal said. "We are ready and prepared and I think we could take 1st and 2nd both days, if not 1st both days."

K-State | Times changed for Wildcat events

The game times for K-State's women's basketball and volleyball games scheduled for Nov. 5 have been changed so that fans and season ticket holders can attend both events.

Volleyball will now play Iowa State at 6 p.m. in Ahearn Field House while the women's basketball team opens its exhibition season against Washburn at 7:30 p.m. at Bramlage Coliseum.

MLB | Boston places Ramirez on waivers

Manny Ramirez makes so much money that even the biggest spenders in baseball don't want him.

Ramirez

The Boston Red Sox placed Manny Ramirez on irrevocable waivers Wednesday, and teams have until noon Friday to claim the slugging left fielder.

Ramirez has five years and $101.5 million remaining on a $160 million, eight-year contract, and would get an extra $1 million if he switches teams. He is scheduled to make $20.5 million next season.

MLB | Thomas stays with Sox

Frank Thomas said Thursday he will exercise a $6 million contract option for next season rather than test the free-agent market for a second straight year.

Thomas

Thomas tested the free agent market for the first time in his career last year after the White Sox invoked a clause in his contract that allowed them to defer most of his $10 million salary.

The two-time AL MVP wound up re-signing with the only team he's ever played for, agreeing to a one-year deal with three mutual options that guaranteed him $22.5 million.

Olympics | Jury seated in bribery case

A jury was seated Thursday in the federal trial of two Salt Lake City bid leaders accused of bribing Olympic officials to bring the 2002 Winter Games to Utah.

Defendants Tom Welch, 59, and Dave Johnson, 44, are accused of lavishing $1 million in cash, gifts and favors on International Olympic Committee delegates who awarded Salt Lake City the games.

They face 15 felony charges, such as bribery racketeering, and fraud, and could face up to 75 years in prison.

Halloween not just a child's day; more adults dressing up for day

By J.D. Garber
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Halloween is increasingly becoming a holiday for adults, sometimes celebrated with kids – but often without them.

In recent years, the number of adults who plan to dress up in their costume of choice and find the best Halloween celebration they can has increased.

Recent surveys have projected that 57 percent of people between the age's 18-24 plan to dress in costume, and nearly half said they would be attending a Halloween party this year, according to the Associated Press.

"I think it has just become a fun time for adults to get together and get a little crazy," Dustin Watkins, senior in architecture, said.

"We expect people to wear costumes, and we try to decorate a little bit with fake spider webs and things like that," Watkins said.

Many people plan on having alcoholic drinks at their party; often they try to make it with a Halloween theme.

"I think I'm going to make some hot apple cider with everclear in it, it's supposed to be pretty cold I think so maybe it will help people stay warm," Watkins said.

Along with all of the house parties in town, many of the local bars plan on celebrating with different activities and prizes for the most creative costumes.

Bowinkles Sports Bar plans to have its annual "Scareoke," which is a lot like regular karaoke, but allows people of age to dress according to the song. People will be awarded prizes for best costume and best costume according to song.

Brett Koons
SENIOR IN ARCHITECTURAL ENGINEERING

Other bars, including Porter's and Rusty's plan on having drink specials around Halloween.

For many, the alcohol isn't what makes them want to go to the parties, it's usually the costumes.

"Everyone I know is dressing up, all of my friends plan on going out," Pollybeth Baber, senior in secondary education, said.

Costume choice has become the highlight for many people during Halloween.

"I plan on wearing my Pippi Longstocking costume. It's really cool," Baber said.

With midterms past and finals looming in the near future, Halloween provides a welcome break for students, Kory Schartz, junior in secondary education, said.

"I do think a lot more college kids are participating, I think it just gives them more time to get away and take a break," Schartz said.

Holiday costume hunt

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Halloween costume is one thing that people may spend hours creating themselves, while others take a faster route by purchasing the complete costume in a package.

Just how far will individuals go to show their costume creativity this year?

Josh Mathews, a sales associate for the Halloween Bootique in Manhattan Town Center, said "Our store has little left. The fastest-selling costume this year was Harry Potter. We sold out of them almost right away."

Halloween Bootique sold costumes for all ages, but the most popular for the teenage females this season were French maid costumes, the pink ladies, as well as genie costumes. Males bought "Scream" masks or Mike Meyers' costumes. Guns and angel wings proved to be the most popular improvised costume pieces sold.

With the perfect costume comes the costume party, in which the chance arises to show creativity.

Halloween Bootique

■ The Halloween Bootique will open until Saturday, November 1, with sales on all remaining costume apparel.

This Halloween staff in the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance. will be wearing costumes with attitude for their costume party honoring Provost James Coffman, who will step down next year. The party also is a fundraiser for scholarships, in which tickets to the party were sold for $50. Half of every ticket sold will go toward scholarships.

"I expect there to be between 80-90 people attending this year's Halloween party," said Marci Maullar, managing director of KSU Theater. "We are having music from Muzizi, a local reggae band, along with catered food from Kapers of Salina.

K-State students helping with the party will be dressed as the Addams Family, with a knight in shining armor attending the entrance.

Legends of ghosts, goblins living in greek houses resurface around Halloween

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On a day for spooky tales of ghosts and goblins used only to scare small children, some campus greeks take things a little more seriously.

1100 FREMONT ST.

Scott Tatro, former treasurer and president of the fraternity, said the building, at 1100 Fremont St., has a very colorful history.

"The building first opened in 1902 and was the site of the first YMCA in Kansas," Tatro said. "Though I have not seen any documentation of this, some say it was the site of the very first KU/K-State basketball game."

Tatro said the YMCA lost its funding sometime in the 1920s, and the building was taken over by a local hospital.

"A lot of prominent alumni and even some current faculty members were actually born in our house," he said.

The first ghost, Tatro said, was named George and was a patient at the hospital.

"The hospital wanted to refurbish the third floor, so they moved the patients to one side of the hospital while they refurbished the other. Story goes – George, who was a very old patient, had fallen between his bed and the wall and was forgotten by the staff."

Legend has it, hospital staff filled his room with furniture transplanted from the side of the hospital being renovated and George was left to die in the crevice, and has haunted the third floor ever since.

"The joke is, he likes Star Trek a lot, because one time a while ago there was a blackout of the whole block," Tatro said. "Except one room of our house and the TV in that room wouldn't turn off, and you couldn't change the channel. It was stuck on a Star Trek marathon."

He said there was a time when he and some of his fraternity brothers were helping to install new light switches in the commons area of the house.

"The wires were dead, but all of a sudden sparks started flying everywhere," he said. "We turned the power off to the house and then turned it back on, and everything worked fine."

George is not alone in the house, though, Tatro said.

"Our other ghost is a night nurse from the hospital," he said. "She was doing her rounds on the third floor and tried to back her cart into the open elevator door, but the elevator wasn't there, and she fell to her death."

She haunts the third floor of the house and the first floor, called "nurses hall," he said.

"The building became a fraternity in the late '50s, and during the '70s sometime they held a Halloween party," Tatro said. "Some drunken frat guys were wandering around exploring the house and saw a cute girl in a nurses outfit."

Tatro said the guys just thought it was an extremely attractive partygoer in a seductive costume, but no one else knew of an attendee who was dressed as a nurse.

"Legend has it that scared her away, and she hasn't been seen since, but some people believe if the house was to get sick, she'd come back and take care of us," Tatro said.

1614 FAIRCHILD

Delta Sigma Phi is not the only haunted greek house in Manhattan. The house now occupied by Pi Kappa Phi, and formerly occupied by Phi Gamma Delta and Theta Xi, at 1614 Fairchild is rumored to be haunted.

Caleb Anderson, current member of Phi Gamma Delta (FIJI), now located at 1919 Hunting, said he is familiar with the story.

"The story is the house is haunted by the ghost of a former member," Anderson said.

Anderson said there is a spot on the wall in the house that was once allegedly, covered with the dead brother's blood.

"They can't get it to go away. Even when they paint over it or wallpaper over it, it still bleeds through," he said.

Also, he said, once a member was alone in the house and asleep when it caught on fire. An unknown and unseen force shook him from his slumber just in time to escape the burning building unharmed.

"The house is believed to be haunted by a ghost named Duncan," Cakin said.

Cakin said when the house was still occupied by Theta Xi fraternity, they were initiating some of their pledges by paddling them when a member was struck in the head and killed.

"I don't know if anyone has ever seen him, but there are stories of radios turning on that aren't plugged in, doors slamming, the usual stuff," he said.

Of course, like all ghost stories, some people are skeptical.

"I don't personally believe in the story, but there are some guys in the house that are petrified of this ghost," Cakin said.

Douglas Lecture Series continues with tradition

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Lou Douglas Lecture Series will continue with a speech from Milo Mumgaard, the executive director of a law center that defends the rights of Nebraska's poor.

Mumgaard is a lawyer in Nebraska who started the nonprofit organization, Nebraska Appleseed Center, in 1996.

Annette Sweet, co-coordinator for the Lou Douglas Lecture Series and senior in family studies and human services, said Mumgaard is a normal choice for speaker at the lecture.

"Everyone they bring in for this series is concerned with human rights. This is no exception. They try to bring people from all over the place to give the campus a variety of options to listen to," Sweet said.

Sweet said there are a few groups that would appreciate the topic of the speech – "Public Interest Law in a Private Interest Age: The Nebraska Experience."

"The Jardine International Students, pre-law students and the leadership studies groups would all appreciate the topic that comes with Mumgaard's speech," Sweet said.

Mumgaard received the Leadership For a Changing World Award in 2001, which is awarded for advocacy of tackling tough social problems.

John Fliter, chair for the Lou Douglas Lecture Series and associate professor of political science, said people interested in law school will find the lecture especially interesting.

"Those interested in going to law school would like this speech. Although this is an age dominated by private practices, this is a good opportunity to hear about. You're not going to become necessarily wealthy if you go into public law, but it is always an option," Fliter said.

Sweet said Douglas' involvement with grassroots activism will be properly reflected through Mumgaard's lecture.

"Lou was a very grassroots activist, and Mumgaard is one, too. He will share what is in an issue. It is important to the community and the state and we hope he can share what he knows about the importance of grassroots activism," Sweet said.

Teen might be charged for killings

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA, Kan. – A teenager who admitted helping take the body parts of three men who were killed to land her family owns in Cowley County might not be charged for her role in the crimes.

Lauren Bertsch had been charged with helping to dispose of the mutilated bodies of Clint Jones and brothers Oscar and Nicolas Ramirez.

The Sedgwick County District Attorney's Office has asked and received approval for a judge to place the 18-year-old woman into a diversion program that could result in dismissal of the charges.

Bertsch took detectives to the makeshift graves.

But much of Bertsch's cooperation came after she told police she didn't want to talk to them. A judge ruled that police kept questioning her after she invoked her constitutional right to remain silent. That meant her testimony could not be used to prosecute her.

A spokeswoman for District Attorney Nola Foulston said the suppression ruling played a part in the decision to grant Bertsch diversion.

Under the agreement, if Bertsch doesn't break the law and cooperates with prosecutors by testifying, the case against her will be dismissed.

Five other people linked to the case have pleaded guilty to aiding a felon and are expected to receive probation at sentencing next month. All have agreed to testify against Arturo Garcia, who is charged with three counts of first-degree murder.

Carol Camp, Jones' mother, said she's disappointed with how the case has developed.

"They were there from the word 'go,' helping," Camp said. "They continued to help them out. I don't understand why they are allowed back on the streets."

Police records and court testimony recount days of deliberate disposal of the bodies, which were at times kept in a freezer while they waited to be transported out of Wichita.

Treatment law for drug offenders takes effect

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – A new law requiring treatment rather than prison for some drug offenders takes effect Saturday amid misgivings in some communities about whether treatment programs are equipped to handle a possible influx of offenders.

The law, signed in April, is designed to divert first-time offenders convicted of simple drug possession from prison, slowing the growth of the state's inmate population. Supporters of the law also believe that treatment programs are a more effective way of dealing with such offenders.

"I'm really energized by this," Patricia Biggs, executive director of the Kansas Sentencing Commission, told The Topeka Capital-Journal. "I think it's a great step forward to try to get people reintegrated into law-abiding community behavior, and it gives offenders a chance to get out of that cycle of addiction."

But some local officials were scrambling this week, still awaiting state approval of their programs, with employees still in training for a state-mandated curriculum for treating drug offenders.

"It's kind of a work in progress," Brad Wedel, interim director of Reno County Community Corrections, told The Hutchinson News.

Money also is a concern. The current state budget contains $5.7 million for treatment programs, when most estimates put their cost at between $9 million and $11 million annually.

"The underlying spirit of what the Legislature did is good," said Sen. David Adkins, R-Leawood. "There are more productive ways to deal with drug offenders than incarcerating them. We've taken that step, but we've refused to swallow the bitter pill of providing enough resources."

Local officials wonder how many offenders they will see and when.

"I think that if this is a situation where we have 25 people walk in the door the first day, we're in trouble," Wedel said. "If they trickle in one or two at a time, we can make an adjustment."

Ron Eisenbarth, owner and director of Eisenbarth & Associates, a treatment center in Topeka, said: "I don't think anybody is for sure on how quick these people are going to hit the system."

Treatment centers that have opted to participate in the program must be certified by the state, which includes a license from the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services.

Gary Lee, chief of recovery services at Valeo Behavioral Health Care, of Topeka, said many of the staff members previously have dealt with community corrections programs, he said.

"This is not a new program for us," he said. "It's a new way to look at the population."

FIJI Run for Leukemia

2003 marked the 30th year for the Phi Gamma Delta Run for Leukemia. The event took place on Tuesday, Sept. 24 when the Kansas and Kansas State FIJIs took turns running the KSU-KU game ball from Lawrence to Manhattan on Highway 24.

The event started in 1974 in memory of Rod Morgan, a Kansas State FIJI who lost his life to cancer. On average, each year brings in roughly $35,000. 2003 was a momentous year as the philanthropy raised $37,000 and reached the $500,000 overall mark.

Men of Phi Gamma Delta raise money from local and statewide businesses and all of the donations go to the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society of Kansas. FIJI is the largest contributor to this foundation. The Kansas State FIJI chapter totals roughly 600 hours in community service through raising money for the event and participating in the run.

Faculty Member of the Month

Dedicated. Passionate. Expressive. Caring. These are just a few of the words used to describe the October Faculty of the Month, Fred Duer, nominated by Sigma Kappa Sorority. Fred is a Scenic Design Professor in the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre, and Dance. Duer has been at K-State for two years, but students say that it seems as though he's always been here because of his dedication to the university and his students.

Duer came to K-State from NBC Studios in California where he designed the sets for weekly sitcoms. He left a promising career to come back to Kansas and train future generations of scenic designers.

Fred not only educates his students, but he takes time to inspire them. He is never too busy to have lunch with a student to discuss career opportunities, or just to provide comfort on a bad day.

Duer is described as a professor who genuinely cares for those around him and wants nothing more than to see them succeed. His outstanding dedication to his profession, his love of teaching, and his incredible talents both as a person and professor make us happy to honor him with this award.

Congratulations, and thank you for your dedication to your students.

Greek of the Month

The October Greek of the Month Award goes to Charles Robben of Alpha Tau Omega. Robben is a junior with a 3.90 GPA in Construction Science and Management. He is being recognized because of his outstanding involvement and dedication to his own chapter and the Kansas State community.

Robben is currently serving as the New membership Education Chairman. He is leading and educating 19 new members on what it means to become a member of Alpha Tau Omega Fraternity. 'Evil Dead 2' provides good, bloody fun

By Jacob Walker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It can be said, without the slightest exaggeration, that "Evil Dead 2" is the best horror movie ever created.

It all takes place in a secluded, run-down cabin in the woods where an ancient evil lurks among the trees. Rubbery, bloated corpses float in the air, chanting threats of damnation in cackling voices as stupid college students stand there and get the crap kicked out of them.

The plot is anything but subtle. Ash (Bruce Campbell) and his honey go to the scary cabin for a romantic vacation, but they don't even make it through the first night together.

Ash plays a recording of a professor translating an evil demon book and gets the attention of the resident ancient evil. Everything basically goes to hell from there.

"Evil Dead 2" will make you wish you were cool enough to run around hacking things up with a chainsaw as an arm.

Realism in 'Summer' adds element of fright to film

By Dana Strongin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Movies with gremlins, goblins and green goo are scary in their own right, but true pants-wetters share one element: they could happen to you.

Think about it: this gang of kids is being stalked by a slicker-wearing, hook-wielding man, just for making one drunken mistake.

Of course, accidentally killing someone, then tossing his body aside, is a pretty big faux pas. But we've all made our own beer-guided bloopers here and there.

This guy is scary. He wears a big floppy hat, likes to be pen pals with the kids and is willing to take his time to get revenge. So much time, in fact, that a killer's ready for a sequel in Brazil because someone "still knows what they did."

I know stuff too, like the fact that I really don't want to die at the hands of a meat hook.

And, as if tanning beds weren't scary enough, don't forget that you, too could get locked into one and left to die. Brazilian vacations are so rough.

Spielberg's 1st movie proves to be a real scream

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Granted, it's not the most challenging thing in the world to scare a first-grader. However, it is quite a feat to have a movie stick with you for over a decade.

The movie "The Duel" (1971), I later found out, was Steven Spielberg's first movie.

"The Duel" stars Dennis Weaver David Mann, who are driving cross country to a meeting, and along the way they anger a truck driver. Eventually, it becomes a high speed thriller that scares the crap out of me.

The elements that make this so scary is that it is a really good psychological thriller.

Halfway through, Mann stops off at a diner for some food and to let the truck pass. He goes immediately to the restroom to gather himself, but when he comes out the creepy truck is parked in the parking lot.

Then it's just him and the truck, and the climax always has me glued to the screen.

This movie is seriously creepy and makes you think twice before you cut off a truck when you're out on the highway road tripping.

Creepy, giant bunny rabbit makes 'Donnie Darko' great

By Kent Holle
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Donnie Darko" is a twisted tale of time travel, mental imbalance and a giant bunny rabbit – by way of H.R. Geiger – named Frank.

As the film's eponymous hero attempts to unravel the mystery around him, events build like a tempest in the tiny hamlet of Middlesex culminating at a Halloween party in 1988.

Jake Gyllenhaal, known for playing outsiders, gives the best performance of his career as the disturbed title character. The standout in the film is Patrick Swayze with his performance as a new age guru preaching gobbledygook about the power of fear and love to the local populace.

Brushed aside during its release in October 2001 thanks to the tale revolving around a jet engine that falls from the sky, "Donnie Darko" is a film almost no one heard of until its home video release (You might recall "Boondock Saints" suffered a similar fate due to the unfortunate timing of the Columbine shootings).

The fact that it's become a cult film since is a testament to its quality. A film that requires multiple viewings to truly appreciate, it will make you laugh, think and probably creep the hell out of you.

Images in 'Village stick in viewers' minds

By Lauren Morano
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In my 20 years of life, I have seen a lot of so–called horror movies. One that I haven't seen in a while, but still remember quite clearly is the 1995 version of "Village of the Damned."

Nine white-blonde-haired, bright blue-eyed children who only wear gray and seem to be from another planet display supernatural and telepathic powers. The scariest parts are when the children begin to control the townspeople's minds – making them torture themselves and commit suicide.

Although I like to watch scary movies, through about half of this one I found myself hiding behind my hands. The scenes were really creative in how the characters die or inflict pain to themselves.

"Village of the Damned" is a movie that even when it's over, the images are still planted in your mind and you're scared to go anywhere by yourself.

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Before Charlton Heston was an old, gun-toting crazy man, he was a young, gun-toting crazy man who made some great movies.

During the 1970s he made a string of futuristic movies, each with a commentary about society and have since become cult favorites. The greatest of these movies was "The Omega Man," released in 1971.

In "The Omega Man," Heston plays Dr. Robert Neville, seemingly the only survivor of biological warfare. The remaining population is turned into melanin-less zombies in holocaust cloaks, who are bent on destroying both technology and Neville.

Neville was the only person to take an experimental vaccine before it was destroyed in a helicopter accident, and therefore is the only living person immune to the virus. He uses his blood to recreate the vaccine and help his companions.

True, this movie is not as scary as some of the others on this page, but it is still entertaining, and I think any movie with zombies is worthy of "Halloween movie" status.

Economy surges with help of consumers, businesses

By Jeannine Aversa
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Accelerating from a jog to a sprint, the economy surged from July through September at the fastest pace in nearly two decades.

Both consumers and businesses helped power the gains, fresh evidence the national rebound is on firmer footing.

The broadest measure of the economy's performance, gross domestic product, grew at a breakneck 7.2 percent annual rate during those three months, more than double the 3.3 percent rate in the previous quarter the Commerce Department reported Thursday.

"Consumers were buying everything from cars and clothes to homes, and businesses are seemingly coming out of their cocoon," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Economy.com.

Economists said that near rock-bottom short-term interest rates, along with President Bush's third round of tax cuts, induced consumers and businesses to spend and invest more and helped the economy move at a faster clip during the summer. The next challenge is making sure the rebound is self-sustaining, they said.

On Wall Street, concerns about the rebound's sustainability weighed on investors. The Dow Jones industrials closed up 12.08 points at 9,786.61.

"Job growth is the key to a sustained economic expansion," said Bill Cheney, chief economist at John Hancock. "If people are worried about their jobs, or worse, if they are getting laid off, then consumer spending is at risk."

The nation's payrolls grew by 57,000 in September – the first increase in eight months. But analysts have said the economy needs to add a lot more jobs than that each month to drive down the 6.1 percent unemployment rate.

After Hours provides alcohol-free opportunities to have fun on Friday

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Free Friday night activities.
Every Friday.
Too good to be true?

For the second year, K-State's Union Program Council is sponsoring the After Hours program. The program started after the First Friday program was nixed.

Samantha Musil, After Hours program adviser, said the program is a step above First Friday, which took place every first Friday of the month.

"Students used to get confused when they had to remember which Friday the free fun would be. This now makes it easier for students to remember and gives it a better name recognition," Musil said.

After Hours is funded with student privilege fees, which Musil said had been allotted by the Student Governing Association. Musil said the funding usually is about $2,000 per event.

"SGA allowed us the money. The student privilege fees pay for everything. Sometimes, there are co-sponsors that decide to pitch in money so we can do more, but usually we stick with the $2,000," she said.

Every week, organizations volunteer to co-sponsor the event. This week, Student Affairs and Social Services is the co-sponsor.

Ashley Freisen, vice chair of SASS and senior in English, said the opportunity to co-sponsor such a large event is beneficial to organizations.

"It is of tremendous benefit to our club. This helps to expose the Student Affairs and Social Services organization and what we work for. It shows what we are associated with and is a good thing for the little guy on campus," she said. "It is also a great way to meet students and have fun."

Freisen said the co-sponsoring organization does a lot of the work in preparation for the activities.

"We host and facilitate the actual event, but there is lots of behind-the-scenes work to be done. We work together with UPC to pick up the prizes and the pumpkins and also have to work with a budget," she said. "We definitely don't just show up on Friday night."

Christina Kostelecky, After Hours committee member and sophomore in environmental pre-law and biology, said After Hours' popularity hasn't slowed since it started in fall of 2002.

"Several of the events have been very successful. The painting of pumpkins last year was very popular, dance lessons are nice, everyone likes to dance. Sumo suits and the big boxing gloves got a lot of people in. Grocery bingo, too, college students are always looking for free food," Kostelecky said.

Kostelecky said After Hours is beneficial to everyone, and it gives them an opportunity to do something they wouldn't normally do.

"The idea is that there's something that promotes students' not drinking. It's also on campus, and it's free. Students can do this, and it's alcohol-free and free of cost," she said. "I hope people will use it that don't want to go drinking or to Aggieville. I hope they use it to have a good time without being forced to do something they don't want to."

Local business associations are working hard to make the holiday fun for people of all ages.

Manhattan Town Center is having its 16th-annual Boo Party tonight for kids to trick-or-treat at participating mall stores. There also will be free face painting and fun balloon friends created for free by Pixie the Clown, the newest addition to the mall's festivities. Pixie will be accepting monetary tips that will go toward breast cancer research.

This year is the fourth year the ATA Black Belt Academy will appear at the mall to participate in the Board Break for the Cure, in which participants attempt to break 1,000 boards in one hour. Proceeds will go to benefit the Susan G. Komen Foundation for Breast Cancer Research.

"October is breast cancer awareness month, and we like to continue our activities that show support," said Audrea Martens, marketing director at Manhattan Town Center.

Aggieville also will be hopping tonight.

There will be trick-or-treating, pumpkin decorating in front of Varney's Book Store and a canned food drive. Participants are asked to bring two canned-food items. Donations from the drive will go to benefit the Mayor's Holiday Tree. Collection centers will be at the corners of 12th and Moro streets and North Manhattan Avenue and Moro Street.

"We will be blocking off 11th and 12th and Moro. Hopefully, all participants will stick around for the Homecoming Parade after trick-or-treating and show their Wildcat spirit," said Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association.

Westloop Shopping Center is having its third-annual Bewitching Treat Trail and Fun Night. There will be an admission fee, but all proceeds will go to benefit the Manhattan Boy Scouts.

"The idea this year is to make it a safe and fun environment that appeals to young families. Last year we had 1,500 kids sign-up to win prizes, giving us a rough estimate of kids participating in our activities. We look for there to be even more this year," said Ed Klimek, marketing director for the Westloop Shopping Center.

It is the 25th year for the Manhattan Jaycee's Haunted House located behind Dara's Fast Lane on Green Valley Road and Hwy. 24. The warehouse will have six scary rooms featuring the electric chair, two chainsaws, a new meat locker theme, a maze with moving walls and more. The newest additions to the usual decorations are three coffins, donated to the Jaycee's after a local warehouse did some cleaning and was unable to throw them away. The house takes five to six minutes to complete.

"We've had 30-40 of our members getting the house ready. Because of fire safety regulations we've been renovating the warehouse and were unable to get the location information out sooner," said Andy Streete, chairman of the haunted house project for the Manhattan Jaycees.

"The money from the haunted house will be used for other chapter operations such as the punt, pass, and kick done each year, as well as Shooter's Education."

Amid some misgivings, drug treatment law takes effect

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – A new law requiring treatment rather than prison for some drug offenders takes effect Saturday amid misgivings in some communities about whether treatment programs are equipped to handle a possible influx of offenders.

The law, signed in April, is designed to divert first-time offenders convicted of simple drug possession from prison, slowing the growth of the state's inmate population.

Supporters of the law also believe treatment programs are a more effective way of dealing with such offenders.

"I'm really energized by this," Patricia Biggs, executive director of the Kansas Sentencing Commission, told The Topeka Capital-Journal. "I think it's a great step forward to try to get people reintegrated into law-abiding community behavior, and it gives offenders a chance to get out of that cycle of addiction."

But some local officials were scrambling this week, still awaiting state approval of their programs, with employees still in training for a state-mandated curriculum for treating drug offenders.

"It's kind of a work in progress," Brad Wedel, interim director of Reno County Community Corrections, told The Hutchinson News.

Money also is a concern. The current state budget contains $5.7 million for treatment programs, when most estimates put their cost at between $9 million and $11 million annually.

"The underlying spirit of what the Legislature did is good," said Sen. David Adkins, R-Leawood. "There are more productive ways to deal with drug offenders than incarcerating them.

Local officials wonder how many offenders they will see and when.

"I think that if this is a situation where we have 25 people walk in the door the first day, we're in trouble," Wedel said. "If they trickle in one or two at a time, we can make an adjustment."

"I don't think anybody is for sure on how quick these people are going to hit the system."

Treatment centers that have opted to participate in the program must be certified by the state, which includes a license from the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services.

University seizes newspapers after editors refuse to run letter

VIRGINIA – Student editors and Hampton University officials reached an agreement to form a task force on the future of the student newspaper late Friday, two days after the school's acting president seized all copies of the paper's homecoming issue.

The task force, which will consist of student editors, professional journalists, faculty and the assistant to the president, will make binding recommendations about the role of The Hampton Script and the amount of control that administrators can exert over it.

The agreement stemmed from an incident Wednesday when administrators at Hampton University confiscated all 6,500 copies of the The Script because editors refused to run a letter from the university's acting president on the front page, students said.

"We agreed to reprint the paper with the memo (from Acting President JoAnn Haysbert) on the front," Talia Buford, editor of The Script said.

Haysbert's letter, which originally was printed on Page 3 of the newspaper, responded to the article that detailed more than 100 health-code violations in four visits by the Virginia Department of Health since March.

"We didn't print something where they wanted it," Talia Buford, editor of the Hampton Script told the Hampton Roads Daily Press. "And they took the papers away."

In her letter to the campus community before the incident, Haysbert described the university's efforts to eliminate health-code violations and said that the university should not be singled out for its violations.

"Two other local universities had multiple violations, some critical and some non-critical, but it is interesting that there was no media attention given to these institutions," she wrote. "The question that a number of us have is, why single out Hampton University?"

According to The Hampton Script article, the university's rate of health violations was well above average.

Buford said she views the agreement as progress, but, "I'm hesitant to call it a pure victory because we don't know what's going to happen yet. We don't view this as a compromise of our morals, ethics or stance, but being stubborn doesn't help anyone."

DIVERSITY | Program funding should only increase in coming year

by the DPC can continue to request funds from the Student Senate Allocations Committee.

The DPC was created to satisfy both student and administration goals, Quackenbush said.

"One of John and Travis' goals, as well as the goals of the administration, has been to increase diversity on campus," she said. "Once we graduate from college we are going to be out working in a world that is in a very global environment. People working on companies now come from all different backgrounds, which requires college graduates to have an understanding of how to work with people from all different racial backgrounds, sexual preferences and different mental and physical handicaps."

The committee consists of student government representatives as well as student representatives of large multi-cultural organizations.

Although there are diversity programs already in place, Quackenbush said, they are usually geared toward the group of students who are organizing the event.

"The DPC events are going to be large scale and high profile things that students, I hope, have a desire to attend," she said. "Instead of seeing smaller events that are targeted toward a small organization, they will be public to the whole student body. It will be open and free to all students."

Quackenbush said she anticipates funding will continue next year at a similar level, however the funding is deemed flexible, meaning it can be eliminated, decreased or increased.

There is a problem with tolerance on K-State's campus, which makes continuing the funding even more necessary, Bakumenko said.

"We do have some issues on campus," she said. "I have been in contact with several people from different organizations that say we do have problems with tolerance on this campus. By raising awareness and allowing people the opportunity to learn more will help the problems. It isn't that they disagree, they just don't know as much about the different cultures."

FRIGHT | Halloween tradition introduces teams

The fun for the children would not be complete without the booths that supplied candy. Homecoming pairings set up booths with games and candy for those who donned in costumes.

Kristy Lowrey, sophomore in pre-medicine and member of the Marlatt, West and Ford pairing, was dressed as a princess.

"We wanted to keep with the Purple Reign theme, so we started the Wildcat Castle. It includes a bean bag throw with candy as the prize, even if they miss after three tries," Lowrey said.

"We call it, 'help Willie knock out the competition.'"

It also gave everyone present a chance to meet the men's and women's basketball teams for the 2003-04 season.

The homecoming pairings received points toward the Homecoming contest for attendance.

Isabel Amaya, senior in microbiology and member of Sigma Lambda Gamma sorority, said her pairing would do well in final homecoming festivities.

"We are with Kappa Delta and Delta Chi. We are excited about the homecoming this year and collaborated with each other and created something we could all have fun with," Amaya said.

"We can't ensure anything, but we can try. Every Regents' institution is having something similar to this," he said.

"The collective effort is where we'll make great strides."

Students have to be proactive, O'Hara said, by letting legislators know this is an issue students care about.

"It's also important that we vote. Complaining really isn't going to work," he said.

"We've tried that before and didn't get results. We have to change our strategy. Let's give them solutions. We don't want to be extremely negative and point our fingers.

where the Cats stand right now, but knows she can expect and get more out of them.

"I like where the team is at, and I certainly like the position they've put themselves in," she said. "But I do think that we're capable of being a much better volleyball team a month from now."

The next home action for the Cats is coming against Iowa State at 6 p.m. Wednesday in Ahearn, where the team is 10-0.

K-State is ranked eighth in the country in attendance, averaging 1,833 fans per game.

"They are amazing and I think that our fans make it so much tougher to play us at home or on the road even, it's incredible," Goehring said. "They are one of a kind. I love them."

CROSS COUNTRY | Cats set for conference

Murer and Trisha Culbertson have been the top Wildcat runners this season, with both capturing individual titles earlier in the year.

Culbertson won the Hurricane Festival in Tulsa, Okla., and Murer at K-State's Wildcat Invitational in Topeka.

The Big 12 Championships present the Wildcats the opportunity to race against some of the best runners in the nation.

The conference boasts several top-25 programs including Missouri, Nebraska, Colorado and Baylor on the women's side and Colorado and Texas A&M on the men's.

In fact, Colorado brings two top-10 squads into the championships, as well as a legacy of dominance over the conference.

Their men and women have captured every team title in Big 12 history with the exception of the K-State women's title in 1998.

That, Cole said, proves how competitive the meet will be.

"You can't rest, because it's going to be nip-tuck with everybody battling," Cole said.

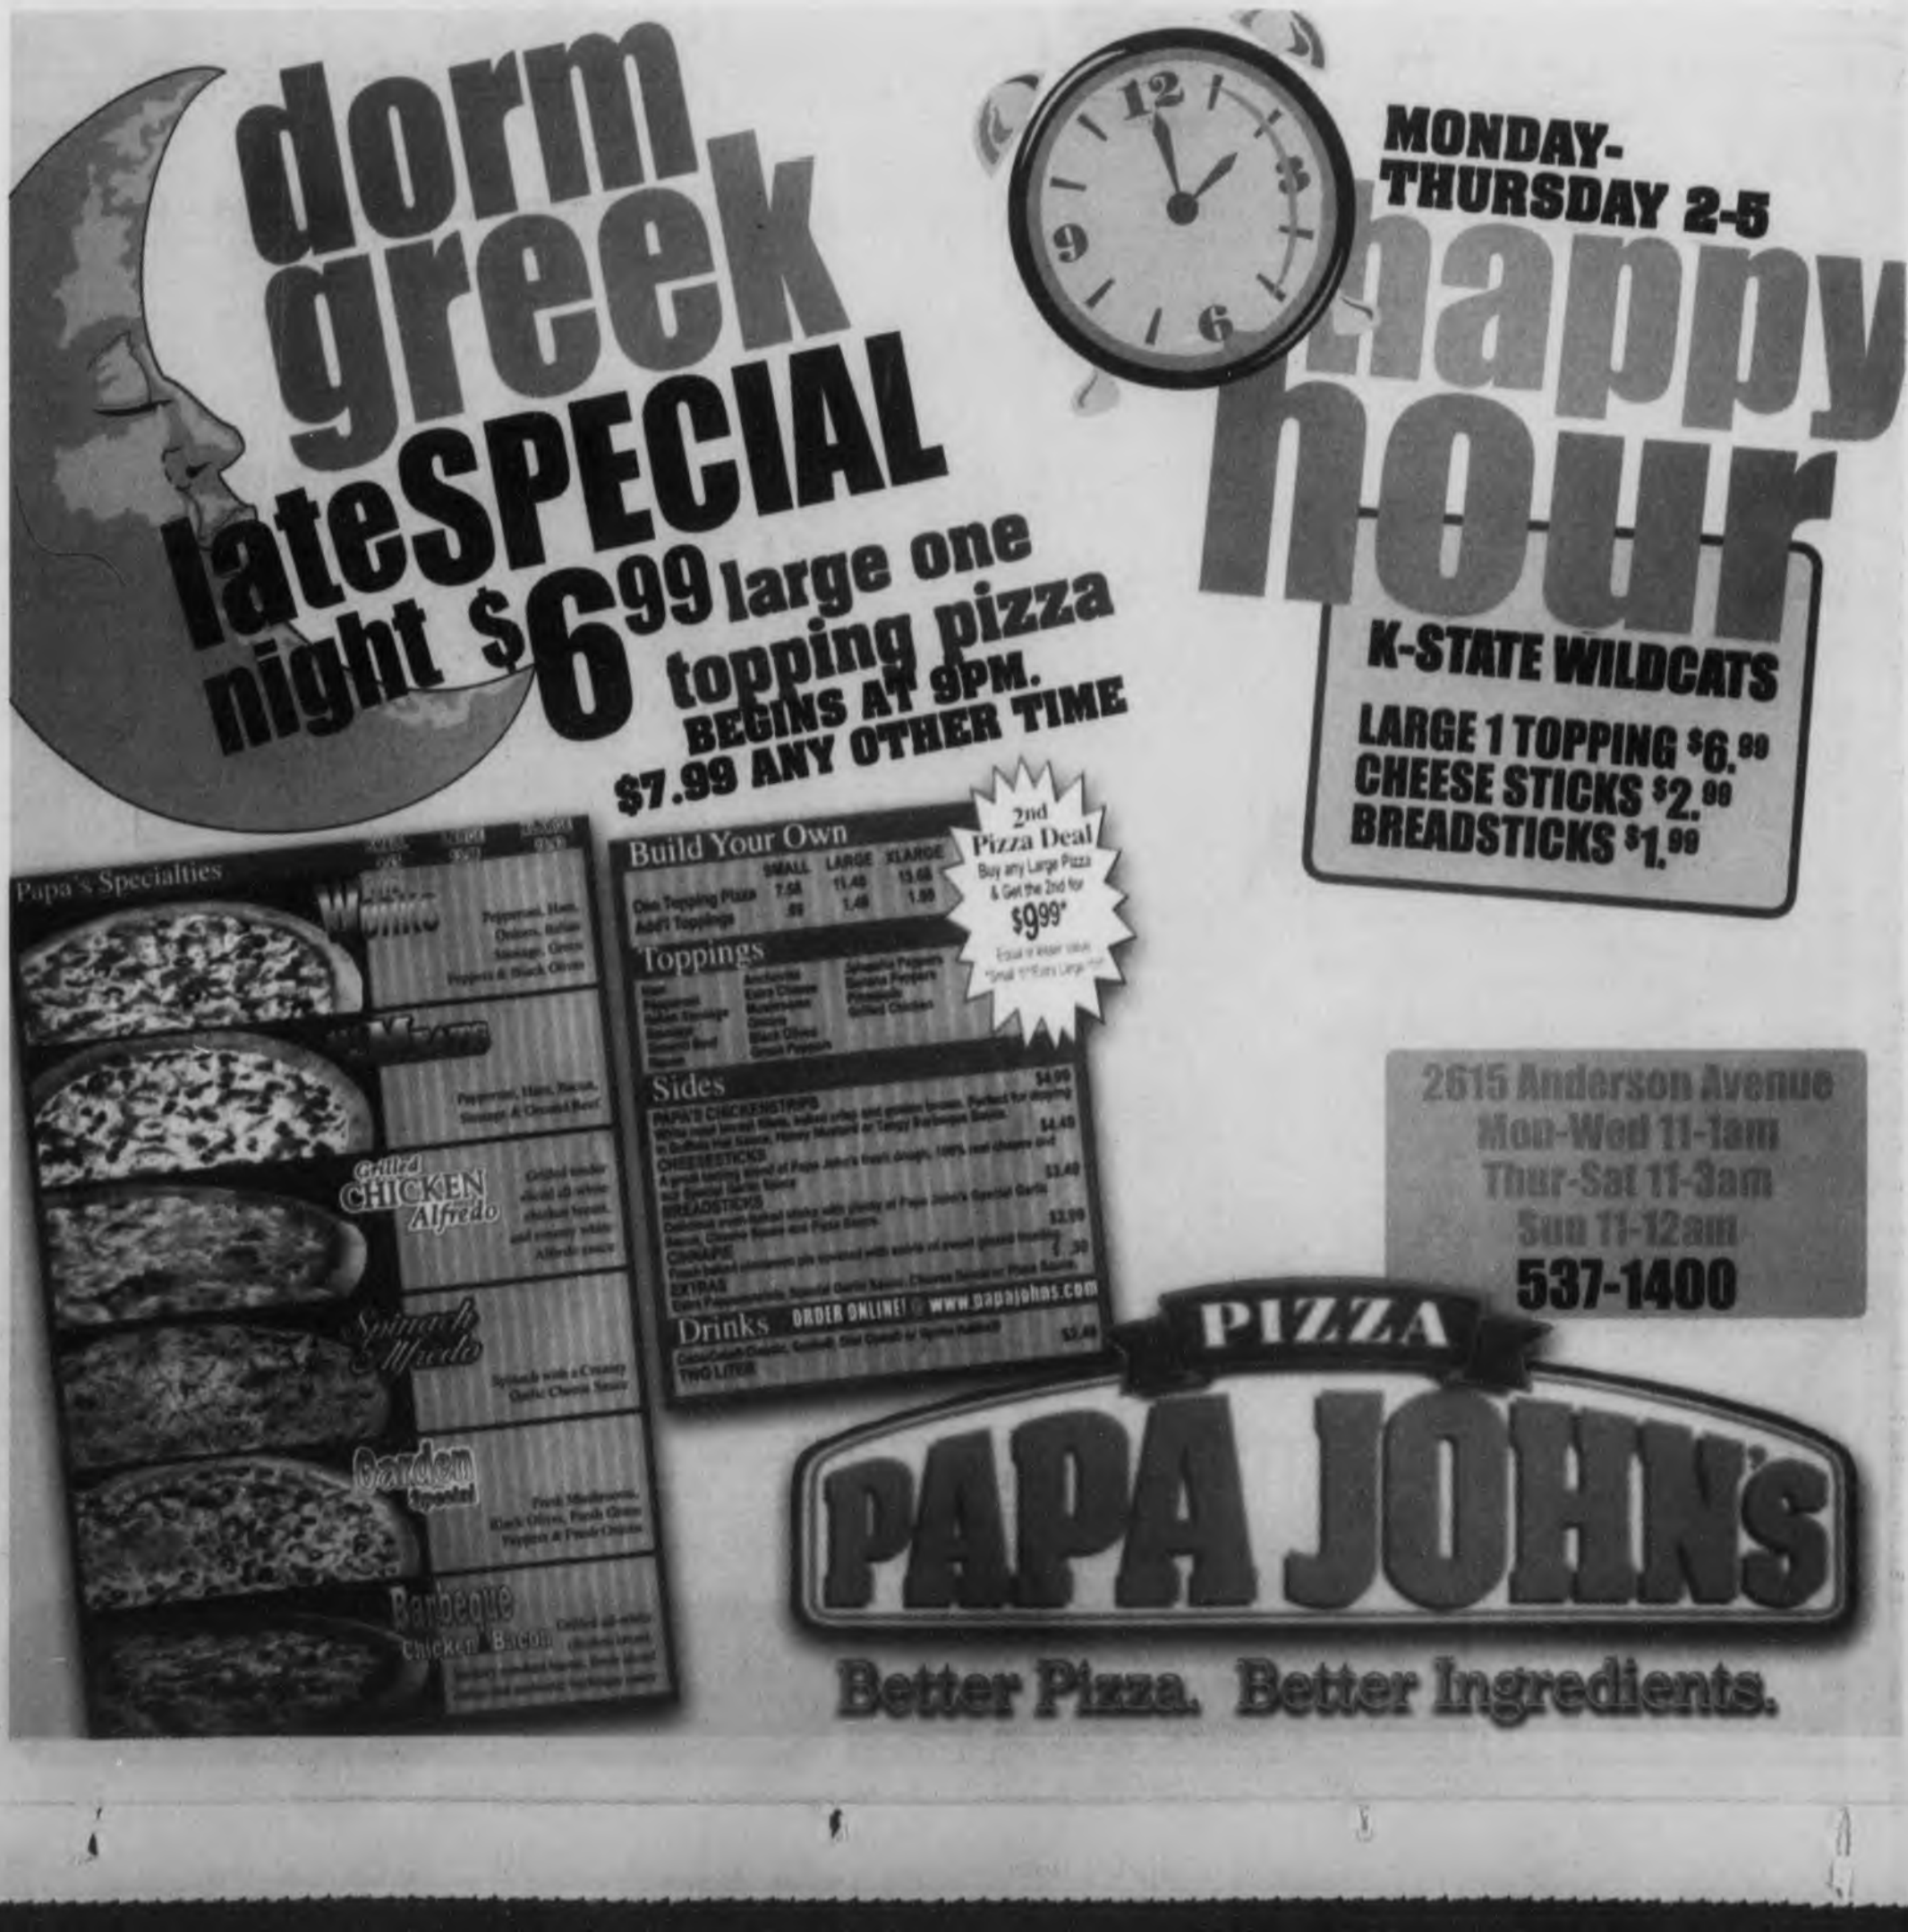
"Places fourth through eighth for the women and fifth through 10th for the men are wide open," he said.

Strong finishes today and at the Regional championships on Nov. 15 in Stillwater, Okla., could provide a stepping stone for the youthful program.

Chesang, Kipchumba, Culbertson and Murer will all return for next year's cross country campaign.

But the future is now for the Wildcats.

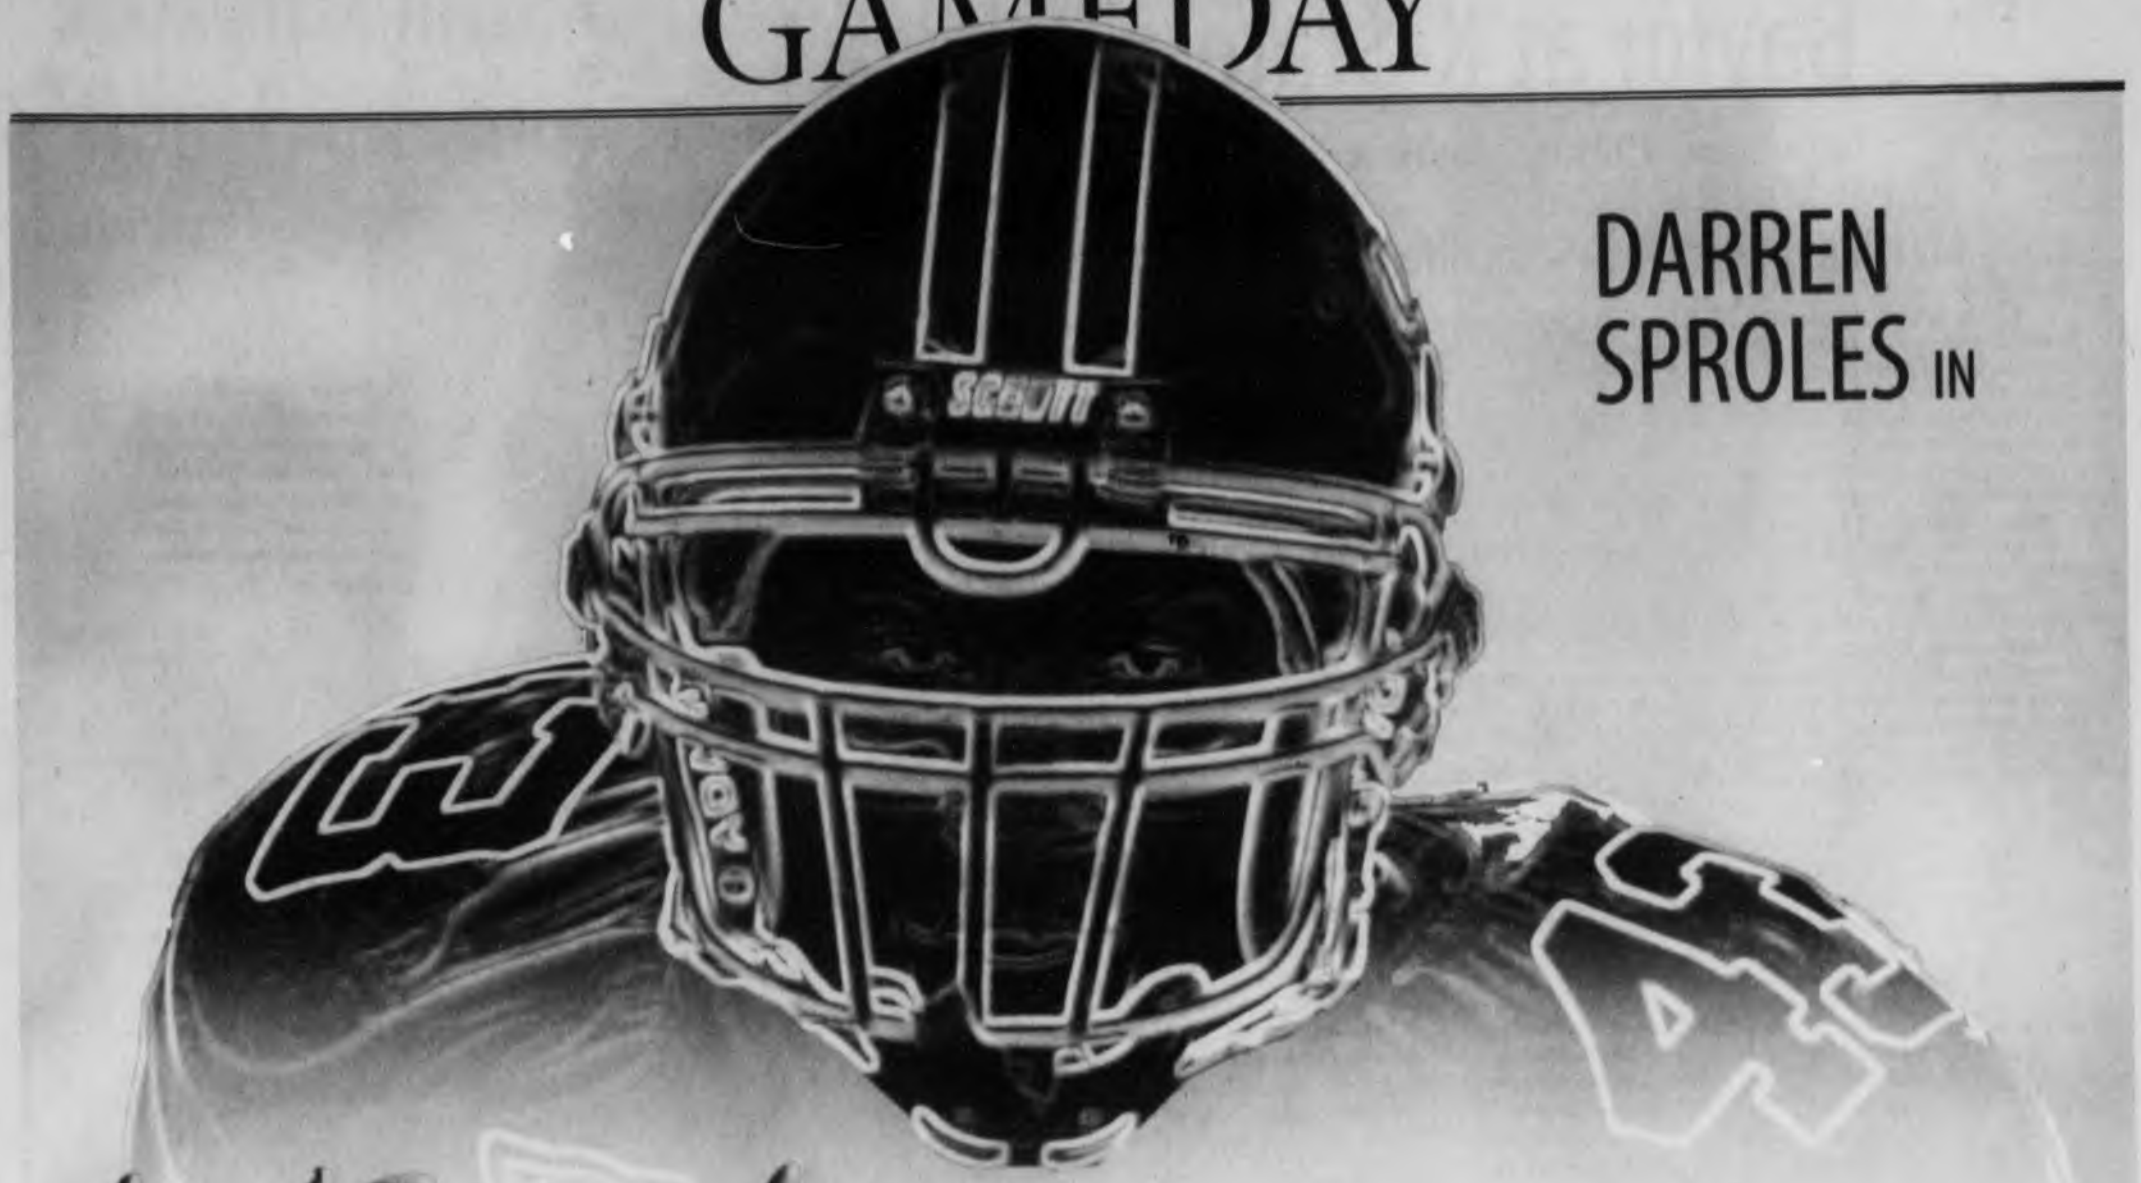
Culbertson said she wants to race with an aggressive fire.



"I want to look back and say I gave it 100 percent," she said.

"I want to be a competitor, not just survive."

With the biggest race of the year approaching, Culbertson knows there will be some jitters.



"Right now I'm relaxed, but I'll be nervous," Culbertson said.

"I've been told if you aren't, you either don't care or you're dead."

Baylor at K-State

Game 10 ■ 1:10 p.m. Saturday ■ KSU Stadium

Matchup to watch: K-State offense vs Baylor defense

Baylor brings one of the worst defenses in college football to Manhattan when the Bears take on K-State Saturday, which could spell trouble for a team that has given up 129 points combined in the last two games.

The Bears' rushing defense is second to last in the Big 12 and ranks 102nd in the nation, giving up more than 200 yards per game on the ground. Compare that to K-State's rushing attack, which averages more than 205 yards per game and ranks 15th in the nation, and the Bears will have to turn their attention to stopping Darren Sproles and Ell Roberson.

Sproles became K-State's all-time leading rusher last weekend against Kansas, and Roberson topped the 100-yard mark against Jayhawks while scoring twice on the ground.

But when Baylor chooses to shut down the run, look for the Wildcats to waste little time in going to the air. K-State averages more than 210 yards passing while the Bears give up 221 yards – another apparent mismatch.

James Terry struggled against Kansas, catching just one pass for five yards, but look for the 6-foot-5 receiver to have a field day against a Baylor secondary that starts no player over six feet tall.

It also behooves the Cats to spread the wealth. Roberson hit six different receivers against the Jayhawks and has hit eight different targets in the last two games.

The Wildcat offense also has been efficient in the red zone, where K-State has scored a touchdown in its last 13 opportunities. During their three-game losing streak, K-State converted just 11-of-18 tries inside the opponent's 20-yard-line.

Baylor ranks 93rd in the nation in total defense out of 117 Division-I college football teams, while the Wildcat offense pumps out 38 points per game in ranking 30th in total offense.

Look for K-State to score early and often against the Bears, based largely on a balanced offensive attack that incorporates Terry more this week.

Wide receiver James Terry leads a Wildcat receiving corps that has been virtually impossible to stop since the return of quarterback Ell Roberson against Texas. Terry is averaging more than 82 yards per game while K-State is averaging more than 210 yards passing per game.

Karas has history of winning from high school glory days

Junior standout leads Baylor offense and its resurrection effort under new coach

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

BAYLOR SPORTS INFORMATION

Quarterback Aaron Karas brings a strong arm and a history of winning to Baylor. The junior started last year as a sophomore, throwing for 1,800 yards.

Aaron Karas hasn't known what winning feels like very much, at least not since coming to Baylor in 2000.

He red-shirted that year, and then started the final two games of his freshman in year in 2001.

The junior's career record stands at 7-15, with just two wins in the Big 12.

In those days he was one of the top prospects in Texas, earning honors from the Waco Tribune-Herald, the Houston Chronicle, the Dallas Morning News and the Fort Worth Star-Telegram.

He broke nearly every record at Spring High, including the all-time passing record of 5,101 yards, and was rated the third-best quarterback in the talent-rich state by several publications.

But since coming to Baylor, wins have been rare, something new coach Guy Morriss thinks his strong-armed quarterback can change.

"In an ideal world, I'd like to throw the ball about 60 percent and run it about 40, depending on our talent and what we're working with," Morriss said. "We throw the ball a lot."

That's where Karas comes in. He threw for nearly 1,800 yards in an offense geared to the ground last season, and threw 13 touchdowns against just six interceptions.

Those numbers haven't changed much in 2002, either. Karas is completing nearly 60 percent of his passes and has already moved into 10th on the career passing chart.

Karas threw for 359 yards in a loss to Kansas on Oct. 5 and has thrown for 10 touchdowns despite being under constant pressure.

"He's a pretty steady guy," K-State defensive coordinator Bob Elliot said.

"He gets them in the right place and is pretty accurate with his throwing."

"He's handled the pressure well. He doesn't do dumb things, doesn't throw it up for grabs."

Bob Elliot
K-STATE DEFENSIVE COORDINATOR

The pressure he's been under, however, has brought Karas's leadership qualities to the forefront. Despite dodging Longhorn defenders play after play, Karas threw for 169 yards and just one interception against Texas.

"He's handled the pressure pretty well," Elliot said. "He doesn't do dumb things, doesn't throw it up for grabs."

That, Coach Bill Snyder said, is what the Bears need at this juncture in Morriss's resurrection effort – a steadying hand that doesn't make mistakes.

"They've been prone to turnovers, penalties and sacks, and those things lose ballgames," Snyder said. "I'm not sure anybody is stopping them as much as themselves.

"The scary thing is what happens when they stop stopping themselves."

That's when Baylor proves dangerous.

The Bears upset Colorado on Oct. 4 in Waco 42-30, marking just the third win in the progam's Big 12 history. That win marked a three-game winning streak for Baylor, which hasn't happened since the Bears started 3-0 in 1996.

That also was the last season under Chuck Reedy, who led the Bears to the Alamo Bowl in 1994.

But this season has marked a resurrgence that harkens back to the days of Baylor as a Southwestern Athletic Conference powerhouse.

And Karas, who Snyder said does a more than adequate job of leading the Bears offense, is the man Morriss is expecting to lead the Bears back to prominence.

"The quarterback does a nice job," he said. "He's improving and when you complete more than 50 percent of your passes, you're doing a good job."

Baylor has never finished any better than last in the Big 12 South.

Guy Morriss hopes to change that.

Morriss was named Baylor's 24th head coach on Dec. 11, 2002, and already has instilled a new sense of self in the Bears' program that has been evident to outsiders as well as those within.

"They went through some coaching changes and I think they're adapting to that very well," center Nick Leckey said. "They've won some games this year and they'll stick through it to the very end."

That's something that hasn't occurred often at Baylor, where the Bears haven't won more than three games in one season since 1996. Their record since the inception of the Big 12 is just 17-61.

But this year the Bears have already won three games, including an upset win over defending Big 12 North champion Colorado.

Morriss, a native Texan, was an All-Pro lineman for the Philadelphia Eagles and the New England Patriots before beginning his coaching career in 1988 as line coach at New England.

He isn't a rookie when it comes to rebuilding programs, though. Morriss was named SEC Coach of the Year for leading Kentucky to a 7-5 record in 2002, just one year removed from a 2-9 season.

He also isn't oblivious to taking over a program at a university in disarray.

At Kentucky, the Wildcats already were on probation from the NCAA and the program's immediate future was unknown.

Morriss was able to stabilize the program, however, turning it in a direction that included two wins over top-25 opponents.

At Baylor, Morriss is charged with not only turning around a losing program, but doing so at a university that has been shaken by the ongoing murder trial of former basketball player Carlton Dotson, who reportedly shot and killed a Baylor teammate.

Those problems have trickled down to the football program, where the Bears already have to recruit against in-state powers Texas and Texas A&M to a smaller school that still has a legacy as a Baptist university.

Those factors make it difficult to win at Baylor, as evidenced by his predecessor, Kevin Steele, and his 9-36 record in five seasons.

But Elliot said the progress being made at Baylor won't be measured by wins and losses this season, and maybe not next season, either. Rather, Morriss' rebuilding will be realized years from now.

"It looks to me that their coaching staff has a good plan for the future," Elliot said. "They're not going to cash in the building of the program for a few cheap wins. They're just trying to play good, solid football."

Silent record-breaker makes enough noise with his play

Sproles rewriting books as K-State's all-time rushing king

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Darren Sproles, a superstar to K-State fans everywhere, is a man cloaked in mystery.

The 5-foot-7 running back might not like to flatter himself, but the rest of the team sure doesn't mind.

"He made me a believer the first time I saw him, probably in practice sometime," Andrew Shull, defensive end, said.

"I'm one of his biggest fans," Josh Buhl said.

"It feels good to know I'm blocking for a kid like that," fullback Travis Wilson said.

Sproles became K-State's all-time leading rusher last week on a broken play that was most appropriate.

Ell Roberson rolled to his left on an option play and after being hit, tossed Sproles one of the ugliest pitches of the game.

"(KU) got a lot of penetration, so I tried to bounce it out a little bit. Actually, they covered it good," Roberson said. "It was just the simple fact that they guy didn't get my hands."

Big mistake. Roberson hurled the ball toward Sproles, who grabbed it on the fly and darted up through the Jayhawk line. Dodging and juking into the secondary, Sproles showed the same voracity that earned him 2,619 yards and a spot in the Wildcat record books.

"Anytime I get a ball to Darren, I know he can make at least one person miss, especially in the open field," Roberson said. "He's one of the hardest guys to tackle in the open field if you try to get up on him. He's so quick with his first three steps."

But the secret to learning about Sproles isn't much of a secret. Reporters bombard Coach Bill Snyder, running backs coach Michael Smith and other teammates with questions about the record holder.

Coaches and players have nearly adopted a form response to questions concerning Sproles' character, work ethic and value to the team.

But that still doesn't mean they don't like talking about him.

"If anyone says they are a bigger fan of Darren Sproles than me, I'll tell them they're a liar," Buhl said. "Going against him and playing against him – (the record) means a lot to me. I know it means a lot to him. He works hard and he plays hard."

That's where Buhl might be wrong, however. Few exhibit the joy Snyder does when talking about Sproles. He repeatedly compliments Sproles' work ethic, attention to detail and unquenchable desire to get better.

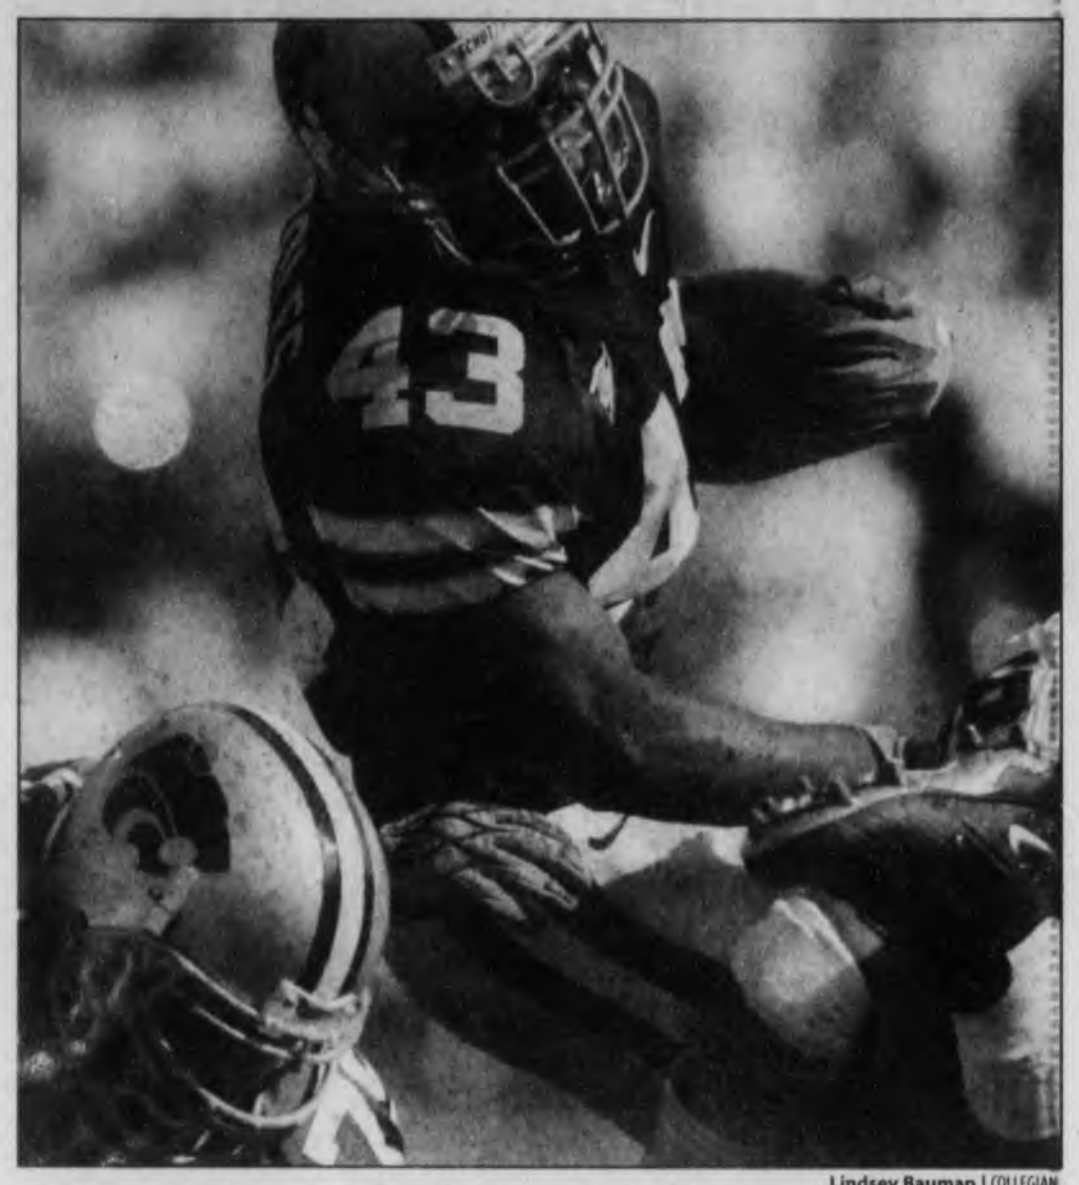
Snyder had to answer questions about Sproles ability to punch through giant linemen so often reporters could have memorized the response.

But when talking about Sproles, there is a lot of ground to cover.

"It did not take long to see that he was a tremendous running back," Snyder said. "There are some things about his game right now that were not evident when he arrived. His ability to block has improved as well as becoming an effective receiver. He is a complete player right now as opposed to when he arrived."

Buhl, Snyder and Smith all agree on several things. First, they love Sproles. Second, not only did he set the career rushing record at K-State, he will shatter it and set the new mark so high it might never be reached. Third, Sproles doesn't care how high the record is.



"He got more out of watching us play well this last week," Smith said.

Still, Sproles is pleased with his place in history.

"It meant a lot to him," Smith said. "He's not a guy who really talks about records, but whenever you accomplish something like that and only be a junior, I think that speaks a lot about him.

"I was happy for him. His whole team was happy for him. He's so deserving of it. Everyone told him congratulations on the sideline.

"He just said 'Thanks.'"

Former receiver Smith in charge of the backfield

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He has coached the top three running backs in K-State history – and he's a former wide receiver.

But Michael Smith doesn't look back on those days very often, when he was the Wildcats' leading receiver, helping K-State in its resurgence under Coach Bill Snyder in the early 1990s.

He instead looks ahead to what the future might bring. That, he said, means watching his current pupil, Darren Sproles, extend the Wildcat career rushing mark.

"I'm just proud as dickens of Darren," Smith said. "I think he'll put it out of reach and the next player to break it will be a special guy."

It's hard to say Sproles would be at the top of the rushing list without Smith, though, just as it would be hard for former Wildcats Mike Lawrence or Eric Hickson to say they did it all on their own, either.

Offensive coordinator Greg Peterson said K-State's running backs coach shouldn't be taken for granted.

"Smitty's a very good football coach," he said. "He understands the game and knows how to relate to these young guys. Sometimes I think he still thinks he's playing."

He might just as well be playing. The ninth-year coach was a standout at K-State, and still has Wildcat records for receptions in a game with 13. In addition, Smith is K-State's No. 2 all-time leading receiver with 179 catches for 2,457 yards, trailing only Kevin Lockett.

While his prolific playing career gave him multiple options after his Wildcat career concluded, Smith chose to return to K-State in a graduate assistant role in 1993, where he assisted Peterson with wide receivers.

After two seasons, a job opened up coaching K-State's running backs, and Smith was the man for the job – despite knowing little about the running game. But that, Peterson said, was never an issue.

"There's a common thread in coaching," Peterson said. "It's about the ability to communicate and motivate and teach. The fundamentals are so closely related."

When he took over in February 1997, Smith began working with Lawrence, helping him break J.J. Smith's career rushing record with 2,265 yards.

But another running back was splitting time with Lawrence, and Hickson was the next back to make a run at the record. He broke it in 1998, gaining 2,537 career yards.

Two years, two records.

Make it three record-breakers with Darren Sproles, who surpassed Lawrence and Hickson last weekend against Kansas. But Smith downplayed even that.

"I'm fortunate enough to coach Mike Lawrence and Eric Hickson and now Darren," Smith said. "They're all great players and meant a lot to this program."

But Smith is the common thread that ties each of those backs together, along with former Wildcat Josh Scobey, who set the the single-season rushing mark in 2001.

Sproles broke that one in 2002 as well.

"I can't tell you I teach them to run the ball," Smith said. "I've just been blessed to have a great group of kids come through."

The Foundation's reunion brings back players, memories

Snyder's 1989-93 teams formed foundation for current success

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Before 11-win seasons, consecutive bowl games and other successes were standard, there were sub-.500 seasons, heartaches, limitless practice hours and, of course, the tearing down of goal posts upon the 20-17 defeat of the North Texas Mean Green.

Members of those teams between the 1989 and 1993 seasons– Coach Bill Snyder's first five years here– are considered the foundation of Wildcat football.

About 78 members of those five teams were in attendance and recognized during K-State's 42-6 win over Kansas on Saturday.

"They're not so called, that is the foundation," Snyder said. "They had a marvelous time. Our fans displayed for them how significant they really are and I really wanted them to understand how special they are.

"What they've meant to Kansas State, not just our football program, but Kansas State in general and what they've meant to this community, is a great deal. They had a great time, they appreciated it and want to do it again and again and again."

The first Wildcat squads under Snyder's guidance, the foundation had a combined record of 27-28-1 during that span.

Although he had his players to coach and KU to prepare for, running backs coach Michael Smith, part of the 1989-1991 teams, said he enjoyed reuniting with his old teammates.

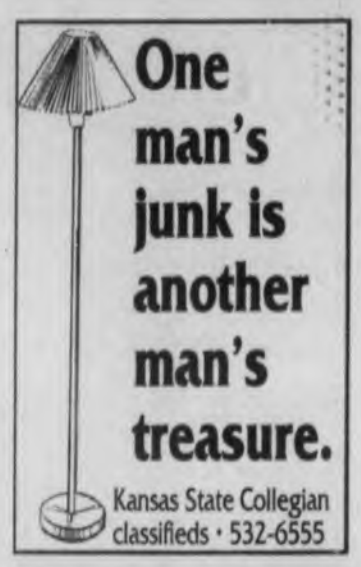
"My best friends are from that time," he said "Saturday night was great. Friday I got to stop in and see them at the dinner. But to see how successful they are away from this proves all the things Coach Snyder was instilling in us as 17 and 18-year-olds paid off.

"It meant a lot to me and it was a great win for us and those guys picked this game because they wanted to see us beat Kansas."

Smith said that they even had a chance to relive some old memories of college life at K-State.

"It felt like it was yesterday," he said. "We went down to Aggieville and tore it down just like we did 10 years ago."

Co-offensive coordinator Del Miller, part of the original core of coaches who arrived with Snyder said the weekend was an emotional time, remembering days when there were no regulations on the amount of practice hours and the contributions made by those teams.



"Coach Snyder is probably very similar to where I was at," he said. "It brought tears to my eyes knowing how hard these guys had to work. This was a neat group of guys."

For current players, playing in front of their predecessors took on a little bit more meaning, senior defensive end Andrew Shull said.

"It meant a lot to us. We took the field when they were down there in the end zone and they were getting ready to get announced," he said. "It means a lot for those guys to come back here and recognize the fact that they still bleed purple and they are still a vital part of this foundation that's been set up here."

Snyder said plans are under way to continue bringing back teams from previous years to be recognized during home football games. In addition, the next inductions into the Ring of Honor would be revealed in either 2004 or 2005.

"It is a special time in your life and it comes and goes very quickly," Snyder said. "And it won't come back, but you can create the memories."

Wilson leads offense, paves way for record-breaking running back

By Andi Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN

"He's from Detroit, Mich., which is not D-town," Leckey said. "Dallas is D-town, but he likes to claim Detroit is D-town. It's not true."

Despite the disagreement, Leckey described Wilson as a leader for K-State.

"He's a tough-ass kid," Leckey said before the Texas game. "He's crazy, and I love the kid and he's just a great leader. He's just one of those guys you know is going to show up on Saturday and give it his all."

And he does give it his all, blocking for one of the top offensive duos in the nation.

"A big part of my job is to block for Ell and Darren and whoever is in there," Wilson said. "As the fullback, that's what you do. You're almost a part of the offensive line with a little bit different of a number. If you get the chance to get the ball every once in a while, you try to do the best that you can. But our biggest job is to lay people out so that those guys can have some holes."

In his final season as a Wildcat, Wilson has played in all nine games and started eight. He's had four catches for 50 yards and one touchdown, and has 23 rushing yards on eight carries.

"I put really big expectations on myself. I consider myself a leader on this team," Wilson said. "I really wanted to lead this team as far as we could go."

Prior to the season, Wilson tried to hangout with his teammates as much as possible to be able to trust them as much as possible.

"If you are hanging out with guys off the field, then you know them better on the field," he said. "Those are the guys you've got to go to war with out there. If you really trust the guys off the field and then you go out on the field, you trust them even more out there. It makes it easier."

Wilson came to K-State as a transfer from Michigan State and had to sit out a year before being able to play.

"As far as geographically-speaking, there was a little bit of an adjustment for him to be make," co-offensive coordinator Greg Peterson said. "He's always played tough football. There were some adjustments coming away from friends and family, but Travis has done nothing but contribute to our wins here at K-State."

Wilson's trait of being vocal is what helps him be a good leader, kicker Joe Rheem said.

"He is probably one of the true leaders on the team. He may not be a captain, but he really leads by telling you what he thinks," Rheem said. "He's a really vocal person, but he'll always be helping you out."

Peterson credits a lot of the teams offensive production to Wilson's blocking.

"He's a great run blocker. He just does what you ask him to do," Peterson said. "He has a role to fulfill, and I know that Darren Sproles would be the first to tell you that if he didn't have Travis in front of him he wouldn't have had all those opportunities to make all those big-yardage plays."

"He'll go out there on the field and do the work and he's also a big guy vocally," Leckey said. "He's a good guy to have on your side. That's for sure."

Kickoff units struggling to find answers

Snyder looking at all options for cure

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the K-State kickoff unit has trouble, Bill Snyder gets a headache.

Not that the coach doesn't know how to deal with problems, it's just that none of the solutions are simple ones.

Jayhawk kick returners piled up 50 yards on two returns, setting them up with short fields and allowing all six points KU scored.

In an effort to avoid a big return, K-State attempted squib and pooch kicks that didn't work much better. The first try found a Jayhawk at the 29 yard line who called for a fair catch. The second try inadvertently drilled a Jayhawk in the front line, and KU recovered at the 45-yard line.

Coverage the week before appeared little better. Colorado's Jeremy Bloom returned a kick for a touchdown just before halftime, snubbing K-State momentum and negating a dominating half.

"We've got a real dilemma there because in order to keep them off the field we have to stop scoring, and I haven't figured out how to totally deal with that," Snyder said.

Rather than trying to keep Ell Roberson and Darren Sproles out of the endzone, Snyder said he thought about having the ball booted out of bounds. Doing so results in an immediate illegal procedure penalty and the ball is placed at the 35 yard line.

"We've got a real dilemma because in order to keep them off the field we have to stop scoring, and I haven't figured out how to totally deal with that."

Bill Snyder
COACH

"The second option is to kick out of bounds and let them at the 35," Snyder said. "But that's about where they're getting it anyway."

Squib kicking to avoid the nimble returners stationed deep was also ruled out on Saturday.

"We excluded the possibility of squib kicking on the ground after we gave it to them at the 45, so that's one option that's disappeared. We're mulling over a variety of different options," Snyder said.

The only option that remains turns out to be the most simple – tackle the returner before he gets good field position.

"The best option is to get better," Snyder said. "Do it right, get where you're supposed to be, kick it where you're supposed to kick it and represent this football team the way you're supposed to represent it."

A job easier said than done, kicker Joe Rheem said.

Unlike many schools, K-State kickers don't try to kill the ball on every kick off. Instead, they try to place it in a deep corner of the field, right at the hash mark on the designated side.

Slight errors caused by wind or poor kicks can result in big returns.

"From a kicker's standpoint, it's about placing that ball perfectly," Rheem said. "If you get right corner, you have to hit that corner or that thing can get scooted out."

Kicking for a touchback, which kicker Jared Brite did three times against KU, is only acceptable in certain circumstances.

"Never here do they want us to boot the ball, unless there's wind behind our back," Rheem said. "Most schools will let you kick it out whenever you want. Here they always want in a certain corner or a certain place on the field."

Responsibility for the kick coverage problems falls on more than just one player's shoulders, though. There are 10 other players, along with the kicker, who need to make the plays.

"I think with the returners, they got some guy with some definite speed and that can make some guys miss," Antoine Polite said. "With us, it's getting 11 guys who want to run down and get to the football."

Passing attack getting sharper

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Antoine Polite and Davin Dennis might be seen skipping in the streets.

K-State, which used to rely upon smash mouth option running plays and deep, home-run passes to keep a defense honest, has adapted a short-passing game K-State fans haven't seen in a long while.

"I love it," Polite, a junior wide receiver, said. "It's like bringing back the high school days – going out there and throwing it around a lot and having fun."

Usually, Ell Roberson struggles to maintain a high completion percentage – acceptable because most of his competed passes were for large gains – but starting with the Oklahoma State game, his numbers have jumped dramatically.

Against the Cowboys, Roberson was 20-of-34 for 332 yards and four touchdowns. It was for a losing cause, however, as his best day ever passing the ball was stymied by three interceptions.

The interception bug was corrected for the Colorado and Kansas games. Roberson completed 30-of-47, gaining 380 yards and four touchdowns.

"It's more of a mixture now," Roberson said of the adapted play calling. "That is working out well for us right now as far as not taking the deep passes all the time and taking some of the smaller passes, the slants and the outs, to put us in a better position."

The change in strategy has been welcomed by receivers. Polite caught just two passes in the first six games but has grabbed 11 in the last three weeks.

He hasn't been the only one to enjoy the bountiful passing game, either. Dennis, who was listed as a starter at the beginning of last season, emerged the last two weeks with six catches, equaling his total from the other games combined.

A receiving corps and passing game that has been seemingly non-existent at times in the last couple of seasons was in need of a boost.

"It starts at the top," Polite said. "The coaches have the confidence to call the plays. Ell has the confidence to throw the ball and the receivers have the confidence to catch it. That's why we're throwing it now."

But the decision to allow more passes, especially in first and second down situations didn't come about through a Bill Snyder epiphany.

Rather, defenses and in-game situations the last three weeks have dictated the change. Even with spark plugs in the backfield, Roberson and Darren Sproles can be slowed when defenders crowd up next to the line and forget about watching for the pass.

"Really, it's just what the defense gives you," fullback Travis Wilson said. "If they're going to be playing off the receivers like that, Ell has made some great checks and some great passes out to those guys."

It certainly doesn't mean that the option-run game that helped Roberson and Sproles to becoming two of the top rushers in K-State history is thrown out, though.

But with the improved confidence at both receiver and quarterback, the Cats said they now have the weapons to burn a defense in ways not possible before.

"We've never had a problem running or throwing the ball, we just have the confidence now where we don't have a problem throwing the ball," Polite said.

"We can mix it up and confuse the defense and it doesn't take away from our run game whatsoever. I think we have the best backfield in the country. It's just that now we have some other guys who we can get the ball."

Leckey a renaissance man on offensive line

By Andi Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four years ago, when Nick Leckey came to K-State from Grapevine, Texas, he immediately made an impact on the team as the first true freshman to play on the offensive line under Bill Snyder.

Since then, the All-American has developed into one of the nation's best offensive linemen.

"He is definitely the leader of the offensive line group," fullback Travis Wilson said. "When you get him on the field he just flips the switch and he's really aggressive and he's just a great blocker out there. He has to make all the calls and do everything for the offensive line, so he's a great leader and he gets his job done."

Leckey piled up preseason awards as Playboy Magazine and Sports Illustrated named him first-team All-American, with three other media outlets.

"He brings so much to this football team. He does all the little things right," offensive coordinator Greg Peterson said. "All the things you want in a football player he does. Being one of our captions, one of our leaders on the team, he does so many tremendous things."

In his senior season, Leckey has started all nine games at center and will be making his 35th-career start against Baylor on Saturday.

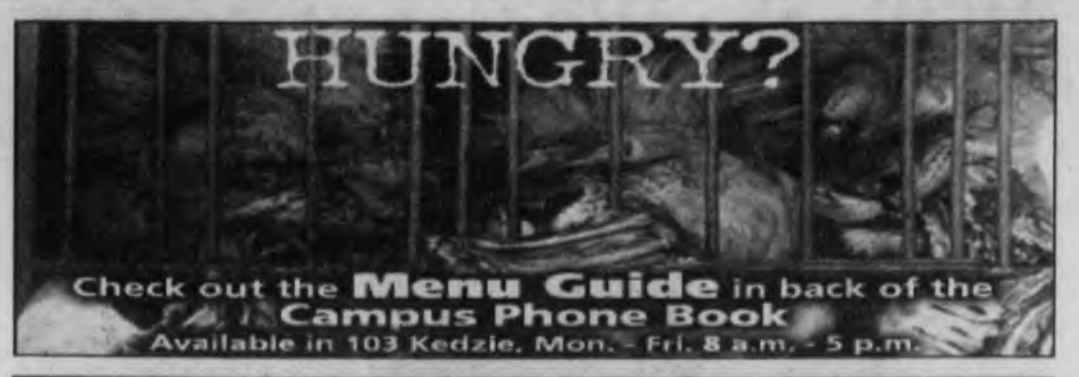
"The people around Nick will hear him talking – he's not really a yeller and a screamer," Peterson said. "Nick does it in his own way, but as far as his work ethic and what he does, he brings his hardhat and lunch pail every day. He's going to do it the right way."

Even with Leckey's talent on the field, his whole life doesn't revolve around football.

"It's important if you are a football player not to get so consumed with football," he said. "If anything bad happens with that, that is your whole life. You need to diversify your interests."

Leckey's interests off the field include reading, surfing the web and listening to music.

"I don't even know what he listens to half the time," Wilson said. "I've listened to some of his CDs, he listens to a little bit of techno stuff, and it wouldn't be music that most people would think an offensive lineman would listen to.



"Most people would think offensive lineman would listen to some hard core, heavy metal or something, and Nick's got mellow laid back stuff. It's a little funny."

After the season, Leckey will have two years left to earn his degree in hotel and restaurant management.

"I want to open a restaurant or a bar," Leckey said, "but that's the grand plan like 15 or 20 years from now. I think I want to be a ski bum when I'm done with everything for a couple years."

With at least four games left in the season, Leckey is trying to make this season his best by helping the team achieve its goals each week.

"I'm really trying to solidify my friendships here and make sure I leave no stone unturned," he said.

Willie the Wildcat at center of K-State athletic events

History of K-State's mascot goes back to 1922

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chris Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN
Willie cheers on the crowd during K-State's game against Kansas at KSU Stadium last Saturday.

He began as a bobcat named Touchdown.

He's evolved into an anonymous mascot.

And wherever he goes, the crowds flock to him.

"I think Willie the Wildcat has generated a great amount of enthusiasm for all generations," said Ernie Barrett, Mr. K-State and director of development for athletics. "Young people swarm to him like flies to honey, and older people like that."

IN THE BEGINNING

K-State established its first wildcat mascot in 1922 with a live bobcat named Touchdown.

Pat Patton, research specialist at Hale Library, said Touchdown lived on campus in a cage near Nichols Hall.

"He lived there for a number of years," Patton said. "They would go get him and parade him around the basketball arena or football games."

Following a move to Sunset Zoological Park, the original Touchdown was replaced over the next 20 years with other bobcats.

Despite rumors, Patton said the original bobcat passed away at Sunset Zoo years ago.

"He lived a good life," she said.

Twenty years later, in 1947, the university decided it needed a change.

"I think the human mascots were becoming more of a school spirit-type of thing," Patton said.

As a result, a coach came up with a surprise during half-time of one of the football games – Sparky, a Manhattan High School cheerleader who dressed as a wildcat and performed gymnastics.

"The costume was quite different – brown, gold, and orange – she was decorated more like a little lion," Patton said. "It was really a trick."

Patton said the girl's identity remained anonymous, but it didn't matter – although fans enjoyed the mascot, a number of people felt that a little girl was not the proper image portraying a wildcat.

WILLIE'S DEBUT

The wildcat the university knows today made its first appearance at a 1964 basketball game, following almost a 20-year span without a mascot.

"The pep squads felt they needed more excitement and thought of possibly having a costume mascot performing at games and with the cheerleaders," Patton said.

Patton said the new wildcat image was well-received by the fans – especially former Collegian writer Loren Paul, who named the mascot Willie in an article written Jan. 10, 1964.

Paul wrote about the significant birth of a new mascot and felt the name Willie appropriately fit the character, Patton said.

EVOLVING TIMES

Over the last two decades, Willie's image has evolved from a cartoon character to the popular powercat logo.

The change from the "Mickey Mouse Willie" of the 1980s and early 1990s to the Willie of the 21st century, however, did not come easy.

Damian Hilton, cheerleading coach, said that when the 21st-century Willie made his debut at a home football game Sept. 13, 1997, the athletics department took a lot of heat.

Patton said the new Willie was a complete surprise to the fans.

"They were used to traditions, and it was a big change," Patton said. "The initial reaction was shock from going to a wildcat head that they knew for a number of years."

After some slight improvements to the mascot's head, Willie's image began to heighten as well.

Now, Hilton said Willie is labeled as K-State's No. 1 fan.

"He's the focal point at games. When it's time to get folks going, he's the leader," he said.

Another change over the past decade was the number on Willie's jersey, which turned from Number 00 to 0 in 1999 after Jamie Adcock, a former mascot, was killed in an automobile accident one month after he graduated in June of that year.

"He was a member of the cheer squad and served as mascot for the sporting events," Patton said. "They retired the jersey and went down to the single digit."

THE MYSTERY

Despite Willie's popularity, one thing remains unknown: his true identity.

"Everyone is always up in your face asking the question, 'Who's Willie?'," Mike Tittel, captain of the cheer squad, said.

Tittel said all members of the cheer squad know Willie's identity – emphasis on the one identity.

"There's only one Willie," he said.

And don't expect the cheerleaders to tell anyone – Tittel said each member of the squad has strict rules with the secret and that "spilling the beans is highly frowned upon."

"We actually refer to it as the circle of trust, which means once you're in, we trust you to keep his identity a secret," Tittel said.

Barrett said Willie's secret identity creates a number of unique characteristics about the mascot – namely his silence.

"He never says anything to anybody," Barrett said. "But that part of it is good – Willie's not supposed to talk."

A CROWD PLEASER

Compared to other mascots in the Big 12, Willie the Wildcat is said to be one of the best – and he has the awards to prove it.

Laura Tietjen, associate director of athletics, said Willie has been rated as one of the top mascots in the nation through a number of cheerleading competitions.

"One of the advantages is the way our mascot is dressed – he's free to do a lot of things, and that gives him the opportunity to do more," Tietjen said.

Barrett said Willie's unique appeal has brought him – and the athletics' teams – success.

"I think he is a good ingredient because of the success of our football program," Barrett said. "Because of the enthusiasm of the crowd, his attitude and his presence makes a great addition to our atmosphere at games. I think that part is very important."

Although Willie's image has changed throughout the years, Patton believes the modern powercat Willie is here to stay.

"I don't think there will be anymore of the fine tuning of it," Patton said. "Each Willie has served the university well and as an ambassador, and that's been so wonderful."

Homecoming week wraps up with Nappy Roots concert and stepshow

Bright lights flashed on the audience as the DJ shouted, "Nappy."

And the crowd yelled back: "Roots."

Two-time Grammy-nominated hip-hop group Nappy Roots performed for a crowd of about 1,300 Saturday night in McCain Auditorium. Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity brought the group to Manhattan for the 13th-annual Neak Frasty step show and concert.

"I was backstage and could see how everybody enjoyed it," said Orion Carrington, special events programmer for Alpha Phi Alpha. "Everybody was out of their seats, jumping up and down and dancing, and it was fun to see everybody's reaction."

Carrington said a diverse group of people attended Neak Frasty.

"I think that it's the first time, since I've been here, I've seen a big mix of people come into an event and enjoy it," Carrington said. "They didn't think about who was there. They just came out to have a good time.

"That's what this was all about. Bringing together people from different backgrounds and showing that they can have a good time together."

The tightly-packed audience danced and sang along to familiar songs such as "AwNaw" and "Po' Folks." Nappy Roots interacted with the crowd throughout the show, encouraging people to clap their hands and sing along.

At the midpoint of the concert, the group took a few moments to turn down the lights and remember those who have died. Nappy Roots said that since Sept. 11, they have done that at every show.

Terry among big playmakers in win against Baylor

K-State 38, Baylor 10

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

James Terry made amends for his one-catch performance against Kansas by catching three touchdown passes in K-State's 38-10 Homecoming win against Baylor Saturday at KSU Stadium.

It was K-State's third-straight win and moved the Wildcats (7-3, 3-2) into a first-place tie in the Big 12 North with Nebraska, who lost to Texas Saturday afternoon.

"If we win, it will play out the way we want it to," he said. "If we don't, it won't. It has to be the understanding of our young people that nothing else makes a difference but what we do."

The senior wide receiver dropped two passes early but then caught eight passes for a career-high 138 yards, which helped pull K-State away from the Bears (3-6, 1-4) after the Wildcats trailed 10-7 late in the second quarter.

"It was a case of would haves, could haves for him," co-offensive coordinator Greg Peterson said. "The two or three drops he had was 80 or 90 yards of passing and probably a couple more scores."

But three touchdowns proved Terry's big-play prowess. The first came early in the second quarter with K-State already trailing by a field goal. Ell Roberson took the snap from the Baylor 22 yard line, rolled to his right and lofted a pass toward the corner of the endzone.

U.S. helicopter shot down in Iraq

16 killed in deadliest attack since March

By Tini Tran
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FALLUJAH, Iraq – Targeting American forces with new audacity, insurgents hiding in a date palm grove shot down a Chinook helicopter carrying dozens of American troops Sunday, killing 16 and wounding 20 in the deadliest strike against U.S. forces since they invaded Iraq in March.

Witnesses said the attackers used missiles – a sign of the increasing sophistication of Iraq's elusive anti-U.S. fighters.

Three other Americans were killed in separate attacks Sunday, including one 1st Armored Division soldier in Baghdad and two U.S. civilians working for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in Fallujah. All three were victims of roadside bombs, the military said.

It was the deadliest day for U.S. troops since March 23 – the first week of the invasion that ousted Saddam Hussein – and a major escalation in the campaign to drive the U.S.-led coalition out of the country.

The giant helicopter was ferrying the soldiers on their way for leave outside Iraq when two missiles streaked into the sky and slammed into the rear of the aircraft, witnesses told The Associated Press. It crashed in flames in farmers' fields west of Baghdad.

"It's clearly a tragic day for America," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said in Washington. "In a long, hard war, we're going to have tragic days. But they're necessary. They're part of a war that's difficult and complicated."

Like past attacks on U.S. forces and a string of suicide bombings that killed dozens in Baghdad the past week, U.S. coalition officials blamed either Saddam loyalists or foreign fighters for the strike outside Fallujah, a center of Sunni Muslim resistance to the U.S. occupation.

President Bush was at his Texas ranch, out of public sight Sunday. "Our will and resolve are unshakable," said a White House spokesman traveling with him.

L. Paul Bremer, the head of the occupation in Iraq, repeated demands that Syria and Iran prevent fighters from crossing their borders into Iraq.

"They could do a much better job of helping us seal that border and keeping terrorist out of Iraq," he told CNN. The "enemies of freedom" in Iraq "are using more sophisticated techniques to attack our forces."

U.S. officials have been warning of the danger of shoulder-fired missiles, thousands of which are now scattered from Saddam's arsenals, and such missiles are believed to have downed two U.S. copters since May 1. Those two crashes – of smaller helicopters – wounded only one American.

WORLD IN REVIEW: 7 THINGS YOU DIDN'T KNOW 7 DAYS AGO

Fire victims return home

Marcio Jose Sanchez | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Coco Clement holds her dog Daisy while sifting through the remains of her burned down home in Waterman Canyon, Calif., on Saturday. Residents of Waterman Canyon are among the few people that have been allowed back into their homes in the San Bernardino Mountains as the Old Fire still poses a threat. The wildfire has scorched more than 90,000 acres, destroyed about 850 homes and killed four people.

Staff and wire reports

A wave of residents Sunday returned to the San Bernardino Mountains to see if their homes survived one of the most destructive infernos.

"The house is completely gone, nothing," Pedro Helguera, 52, said of the home he and his wife had lived in for 24 years. "We've got to start from the bottom."

The blaze, known as the Old Fire, was among a barrage of wildfires that have killed 20 people, destroyed more than 3,400 homes and burned nearly 750,000 acres across Southern California.

DEATH TOLL INCREASES IN IRAQ

As of Sunday, , 360 U.S. service members have died since the beginning of military operations in Iraq, according to the Department of Defense.

Since the start of military operations, 1,811 U.S. service members have been injured as a result of hostile action, according to U.S. Central Command. Noncombat injuries numbered 338.

Last week,. at least 23 U.S. soldiers were confirmed dead.

JESUS WAS MARRIED?

ABC news correspondent Elizabeth Vargas said her network is stepping into a theological minefield with its one-hour exploration of whether Jesus Christ had a wife.

Vargas

"You can't talk about this subject without intriguing people or offending people," Vargas said.

The show asserts that Mary Magdalene was Jesus' wife – not a prostitute, as in some teachings – and that she fled Jerusalem with his child following his crucifixion.

K-STATER FACES MURDER CHARGE

A K-State student was charged with second-degree murder of her newborn baby. Prosecutors say she abandoned the full-term newborn, stuck it in a duffel bag and placed it in a trash bin on Oct. 13.

OUR FLAMING SUN

The most powerful geomagnetic storm possible walloped the Earth early Wednesday, knocking out some airline communications but apparently causing no large power outages or other major problems.

The storm, the most disruptive to hit Earth since 1989, was unleashed by the fourth-most powerful solar flare ever seen, NASA said.

AN ATLANTIC CITY DISASTER

Rescue workers gingerly searching through the wreckage of a collapsed casino parking garage found the body of a fourth victim early Friday in a crushed stairwell.

Because of the location and the danger of the unstable wreckage, it took searchers nearly four hours of cutting through cement and clearing debris by hand to remove the body. Afterward, they were ordered off the structure while workers tried to stabilize it with steel cables.

The cause of the collapse still is under investigation.

Sanders, Tredway to be ambassadors

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN
Mandy Achilles, senior in mass communications, hugs Kristy Tredway, junior in agricultural economics, after Tredway was named one of the two 2004 student ambassadors before Saturday's football game. Seth Sanders, junior in finance, also was named an ambassador.

K-State students voted Thursday for student ambassadors, and the two ambassadors-elect will take office in January.

The pair will take over the duties of current ambassadors Mandy Achilles and Blake Bauer.

"I felt excitement to represent K-State and for my family, the good times I'll have with Kristy," Sanders said.

Tredway said she felt the same.

"I had goosebumps and was overjoyed to have this opportunity," Tredway said.

Sanders has already made plans, though he doesn't officially start serving until next year.

"First and foremost, I want to raise the bar Blake and Mandy have set. I know this will be hard, but that's the goal," Sanders said.

Tredway said challenges may be present in the year to come.

"Trying to represent the entire diverse student body and balancing my time and other commitments may prove to be a challenge," Tredway said.

Missy Decker-Heidrick, associate director of alumni programs and adviser to the ambassadors, said the ambassadors will begin officially at the start of 2004, but will participate in activities this semester.

"They will probably go to an alumni center student recruitment event at the end of November and assist the president's office," Decker-Heidrick said.

Decker-Heidrick said she looks forward to working with Sanders and Tredway.

"I think they'll do a fantastic job. The experiences we'll have and to see them share with others on campus, their bright and fun personalities will be creative in many aspects," Decker-Heidrick said.

Flu shots are encouraged as weather turns cold; outbreaks have been earlier than usual this year

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The weather is turning cold, which means among other things, flu season.

Kathy Dickey, clinic supervisor for the Riley County health department, said the influenza virus has become problematic earlier this year than in the past.

"Normally we don't see outbreaks until January," Dickey said.

She said schools have already been closed throughout the country because of the flu.

"With people traveling, we certainly encourage people to get a flu shot," Dickey said.

She said flu shots are recommended for people with cardiovascular problems, those over the age of 65 and infants six to 23 months old. These groups have a high probability of being hospitalized when they have the flu.

Although flu shots are not necessarily recommended for the average healthy college student, a shot still can be helpful.

"If they don't want to get the flu infection during finals week or when they have a lot of things going on, then a vaccine is a good way to stay healthy so they won't be laid up for four or five days," Jay Reppert, Lafene Medical Director, said

This is the first post-SARS flu season, and because severe acute respiratory syndrome and the flu share some of the same symptoms like a cough, muscle aches and fever, Reppert said he could see why people confuse influenza for SARS.

When asked whether he thinks SARS will ever be as big a problem as the flu, he said "I hope not."

"We don't have any medication or vaccines that work and it's got a 10 percent death rate in the parts of the world where it occurred," he said.

However, Reppert said there are good reasons why SARS will not recur.

"Everybody's ready for it and we hope if it does recur it can be contained like it was last year."

This containment was accomplished by isolating people who were infected, closing schools and stopping mass transportation.

"I think it's very much on the forefront for both the Center for Disease Control and the World Health Organization," he said.

This is the first time in three years the desired amount of injections were received. Reppert hopes Lafene will give over 1,000 vaccinations.

Lafene typically administers 1,400 flu vaccines each year, but Reppert said for the last two years that number was only about 700. Officials had trouble culturing strains of the flu covered by the vaccination.

Dickey said the health department has already administered about 2,200 hundred doses, giving vaccinations at 27 businesses and schools.

Lafene is offering three flu clinics during the next three Thursdays, for walk-in vaccinations. Vaccinations can be given on other days but by appointment only. Though Lafene is offering vaccinations during the next three weeks, the sooner the vaccination is administered, the better.

"After getting the flu shot it takes the body several weeks to make that adjustment and create those defenses," Carol Kennedy, Lafene's director of health promotions, said.

TO THE POINT

Successes need to be reported along with casualties

Americans need to be more informed about U.S. involvement in Iraq, Afghanistan and abroad.

Those who have recently begun to express discontent with Operation Iraqi Freedom see the same thing most of us do – soldiers being killed while on patrol.

But what are they patrolling? What types of programs have been instituted to improve the country and get our soldiers home?

Whether the soldiers are rebuilding schools, training citizens to become part of a democratic system and teaching them how to function without a draconian leader, the Bush administration and military officials need to disseminate that information accurately and efficiently.

Americans appreciate the honesty of fair reporting of casualties. But in an effort to maintain fairness, the military is losing support by not pushing the successes of the missions.

In addition, the news media – including the Collegian – need to make more concerted efforts to report all sides of the story.

Although deaths may sell newspapers, denying readers any aspect of pertinent information may lead to a skewed public opinion.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Potluck connections

Good or bad, college roommates are part of university experience

AMY LINK

You're nervous, excited and scared.

These are the feelings of all those who went potluck when selecting their college roommates.

Sure, you may have received a letter during the summer with their name and contact information. You may have even talked about what to bring, among other things, but standing in your residence hall room waiting to meet them for the first time is unforgettable.

College roommates are a right of passage.

As a transfer student, I had to go through the potluck experience twice – and I'm grateful for it.

I always wondered how those basic questions on your housing application – whether you're a morning or night person or if you study with the radio on – could determine with whom you would share a room.

After all, soon your roommate becomes an instant ally, especially if you do not know anyone on campus. Whether you hit it off right away is irrelevant to the fact that you need him or her.

Roommates can keep you from feeling lost on a big campus, because they may be the only people who know you at first. They become family.

Like family, you may have personality conflicts that can make a residence hall room feel like a jail cell. Another problem could be that, unlike your annoying siblings, your roommate may have a similar personality but a different idea of how your living situation should work.

Despite the problems that are bound to occur when two strangers live together, I wouldn't trade it for anything.

Going potluck allows you to expand your horizons if you live with someone different from yourself, or it gives you a chance to meet someone similar. Either way, it is a chance to grow as a person, learning more about yourself through how your roommates see you.

Generally, we all outgrow our first roommates and decide to move in with other friends later on.

This is also a good thing, because it allows you to get to know your friends better.

The old saying goes, "You should never move in with a best friend because you'll end up hating each other."

I disagree.

Sure, that is the case for some friends, but it leads you to wonder how good their friendship really was. Living with your friends can be a great experience.

College years provide you with a lot of memories, both good and bad. Roommates become the keepers of these moments.

They are often the last people we talk to at night. They are there when we ace the test or get homesick. They remember when the fire alarm went off in the middle of the night. They know what we are like in the morning.

So when the lease ends, your connection doesn't, no matter how you part.

If things went well, they will always be a great friend who knows you better than most people – after all, how many people do you live with in a lifetime.

Even if you decide you are not meant to be best friends, you will always remember them.

Occasionally, you will pass them on campus, and though you may just greet them casually, there is always something more, and years from now you'll remember them, whether you speak to them or not.

For a while, you were each other's keeper.

So whether a machine chooses your roommate or you do, enjoy the unexpected adventures that come with living together.

I know I have, thanks to all the girls in E-17.

State, federal obscenity laws worse than the items they try to control

JESSE LOEWEN

Last February, a Wichita man was sentenced to two years of probation after being charged with violation of Kansas obscenity laws.

I wonder how many K-Staters are guilty of that crime.

When I read this I began my own search of our state and federal obscenity laws. I found that both Kansas and federal laws fail to properly define what is considered obscene material and, in the case of our state laws, are selectively enforced at best.

Consequently, we should do away with both federal and state obscenity laws.

According to U.S. Code, Title 18, Section 1462, obscene material is "(a) any obscene, lewd, lascivious or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, motion-picture film, paper, letter, writing, print or other matter of indecent character; or (b) any obscene, lewd, lascivious or filthy phonograph recording, electrical transcription or other article or thing capable of producing sound; or..." a number of things relating to abortion, making the definition of what is obscene a purely subjective matter.

Because "The Communist Manifesto" promotes a way of life we do not agree with, "The Joy of Sex" deals with a subject many are not comfortable talking about, and "Playboy" shows pictures of beautiful naked women, these three publications could be considered obscene under the federal definition.

For that matter, so could "Cosmopolitan" and the "Sports Illustrated" swimsuit issue. At the federal level, there is no real way to determine what is obscene and what is not.

Kansas laws, on the other hand, are a little more specific, but still need better definitions.

Kansas Statute Number 21-4301 considers something obscene if "the average person applying contemporary community standards would find that the material or performance, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient (sexual) interest."

It later defines dildos and other sex toys as obscene if they are not intended for therapeutic use.

Under Kansas law, obscene material is pretty much anything a community determines to be so, meaning what is obscene in Topeka may not be obscene in St. Louis. What one group of citizens from a community determines to be obscene, another group may not, making the Kansas law extremely open to interpretation.

However, what is more disconcerting than the laws themselves is how they are enforced.

I doubt there is anyone who will argue the dancers at Baby Dolls, Wild Cherry and Club Orleans in Topeka do not "appeal to the prurient interest."

I also doubt there is a single clerk in a Priscilla's or After Dark Video in this state who will tell you the vibrators and dildos they stock are meant for sexual therapy and sold with a prescription.

Simply by visiting these retailers and buying their products, Kansas residents are violating state law.

Obviously, state and federal obscenity laws are only rarely enforced, meaning most people break them unknowingly. However, should a person be charged under these laws, their "crime" will haunt them for the rest of their life.

The Wichita man I mentioned will be considered a convicted felon for the rest of his life.

State and federal obscenity laws need to be either abolished or rewritten to explicitly describe what is considered obscene. Then they need to be enforced properly and equally.

That a person can visit a commercial retailer, openly purchase the products available there and potentially end up in prison, branded a felon, is more obscene than any of the items these laws were intended to ban.

Downtown to receive facelift

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Soon, downtown Manhattan will undergo a major change, said Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager and redevelopment coordinator for the city of Manhattan.

Thursday was the first public meeting on the issue.

Proposals at the meeting included single-family and multi-family town homes and other images of revamped business property.

Hilgers said several key players presented various storyboards and sketches of possible alterations to the district for Manhattan citizens to view and select the ones they thought would be best.

Bob Welstead from Dial Realty in Omaha, Neb., Paul Shaw of the Dallas, Texas branch of RTKL Inc., and Brent Bowman, local architect, were the presenters.

The city has a contract with Dial Realty to move forward on the project once the specific design is established, he said.

"Dial is going to be very active in attempting to purchase property," Hilgers said.

"They have been pleasantly surprised by the community response."

A final proposal would require that Dial purchase the property in question to begin developing.

The proposed area is bound by Bluemont Avenue, Fourth Street, Fort Riley Boulevard and Tuttle Creek Boulevard.

"We are in the beginning stages to try and get a feel from the community to see if they would like to see this downtown development go, and as they move through the master plan process, they will piece together community input to come up with the plan," Hilgers said.

John Armbrust, vice president of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said the chamber is not in the lead but does play a critical role in developing the concept of downtown redevelopment.

"We were instrumental in initiating some of the activity that is going on right now," Armbrust said.

"We are supportive of the project at this point and we feel our role is to continue to help the project, making sure it benefits businesses and homeowners as much as possible."

Kent Glasscock, chair of the Downtown Redevelopment Steering Committee, said his committee will work with the public and the design team chosen by the commission to bring the master plan to completion.

"There was a decision 15 years ago to have the downtown area as the city's retailing core," Glasscock said.

The process of developing a master plan will probably take four or five months, he said.

Foreign student enrollment slows in U.S.; experts blame tightened visa policies

By Steve Giegerich
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A new study says the number of foreign students attending U.S. colleges increased by less than 1 percent in 2002-03 – the lowest growth rate in seven years. It's just the latest piece of evidence that international students are shying away from the United States because of tough immigration rules.

The Institute of International Education said tightened visa procedures enacted after the 2001 terrorist attacks, which have delayed the entry of many foreigners into the United States, contributed to the low growth rate.

The IIE said in its annual "Open Doors" report, to be released Monday, that foreign enrollment increased by only 0.6 percent last year. In each of the two previous academic years, foreign enrollment had increased by 6.4 percent.

"It's not just the policies themselves, but the understanding and perception of the policies that have really affected the numbers," said Peggy Blumenthal, the IIE's vice president of educational services.

"The word of mouth is out in certain countries about the difficulty getting a visa. And the perception is having as much of an impact as the delays."

Foreign students started experiencing delays entering the country in the wake of the terrorist attacks on Washington and New York, as the federal government responded to calls for tighter domestic security. One of the Sept. 11 hijackers held a student visa.

U.S. schools want foreign students both for the revenue they bring in, the IIE said international students spend up to $12 billion annually between tuition and other expenses, and their contributions to academic research.

A continuing decline in foreign student enrollment "may damage our ability to attract the best and the brightest," said Alice Gast, vice president of research and associate provost at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

In a separate online survey, the IIE said 46 percent of U.S. colleges reported declines in foreign enrollment in the current school year. There were 586,323 international students studying in the United States last year, said the IIE, which promotes closer educational relations between the United States and other nations.

The IIE's findings are similar to those that the Association of International Educators, known as NAFSA, expects to reveal when it releases a survey of 2003-04 foreign student attendance later this week, said Victor Johnson, NAFSA's associate executive director.

NAFSA conducted its report in conjunction with the Association of American Universities and the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges.

Johnson said that, unlike previous slowdowns in foreign enrollment, this one was triggered by a change in U.S. policy and not economic declines or political unrest.

He predicted that foreign enrollment may decline even more if Congress or the State Department fails to relax visa restrictions on students coming to America. Foreign students will "give up trying and go somewhere else," Johnson said.

For instance, the number of Chinese students enrolling in British institutions rose by over 36 percent this year, according to the United Kingdom's Universities & Colleges Admissions Service. Enrollment of students from India in British colleges increased by 16 percent.

Honor system evolves to current form

K-State's trial and investigation method differs from other schools

Editor's note: The honor system at K-State has been discussed significantly in recent weeks following the investigation of Sara Fischer's Introduction to Sociology class. The Collegian's Sarah Rice reports on how the system was created and how other universities' honor systems compare to K-State's.

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's honor system, despite its recent attention, is a fairly new program.

It was only four years ago that the system came into existence after a cheating scandal in a large lecture class. The scandal occurred during the fall 1994 semester, and Provost James Coffman set up a task force. In 1996, Student Body Vice President Brad Finkeldei created a draft of the honor code, which now reads, "On my honor as a student, I have neither given nor received unauthorized aid on this academic work."

The full system wasn't implemented until 1999.

"There was a lot of faculty cynicism," Director Phil Anderson said. "But it works. It provides for the university a procedure for dealing with honors pledge violations."

Anderson said the recent violations in a sociology class involving a large number of students are testing the system's effectiveness.

"We are learning a lot," he said. "You have to make mistakes to learn. There are some things we could have done differently to make it faster and ease the stress on those involved."

The honor council is made up of faculty and students from each college. Both the dean of student life and associate provost for diversity make three at-large appointments. A new addition, Anderson said, is the honor system being incorporated into the graduate school, which would require the election of 10 graduate students to the council.

The council has student investigators, both students and faculty, that collect evidence once an honor pledge violation has been reported. Once the evidence is collected, the honor council determines if a hearing is necessary. If so, hearings are scripted, and they often can last several hours.

"We establish what the charges are," Anderson said. "Investigators present a case. The interviewers summarize what they have learned. The reported violator is asked if they have anything to add. The alleged violator gets to comment. We give the alleged violator the last word."

The consequences of a violation can vary from suspension and expulsion from the university to lesser violations that warrant enrollment in the academic integrity course. Those who are found guilty are commonly given an XF in the course. The X denotes failure in the course because of a honor pledge violation.

"After your first honor violation, you take the academic integrity course," Anderson said. "It's a small group, and I read all the course evaluations and they are invariably positive. For many of them, it's a life-altering event."

Whatever the hearing panel says, goes.

"Whatever decisions the hearing panel makes becomes final," Anderson said. "The hearing panel cannot suspend or expel, it has to be recommended to the provost. If the hearing panel recommends it, the provost takes it very seriously. It would be very difficult for the provost we have now to not follow through on that sanction."

At the University of Kansas, there is no overall honor code or uniform system, however officials are currently investigating that possibility.

"We are currently looking at honor codes to see if that i s something we want to do," said Pam Houston, director of undergraduate services in the College of Liberal Arts. "We have university-wide guidelines. There are nine different level of sanctions that can be imposed on a student if he or she is found guilty."

Sanctions include verbal or written warnings, reduction of grade in the class and failure of the course. More serious sanctions requires a hearing by the department chair and dean of the college. The case is forwarded to the provost to keep a record of misconduct.

"We believe if someone makes a mistake, they can be educated and try to show them this is the wrong way. We believe it's a form of student development."

Phil Anderson
DIRECTOR OF K-STATE'S HONOR SYSTEM

"Our university rules and regulations and certain guidelines that we follow in making sure due process is followed," Houston said. "I think one of the problems we are experiencing right now is that we have some concerns about whether all departments or schools are forwarding all the information to the provost's office. We are educating this year to make sure things don't stay at the department level."

Houston said officials are now comparing other universities' policies to develop a more in-depth system for KU. She said the need for such a policy has increased with more stress being put on students.

"Students get in a very stressful situation and do some things that sometimes they regret very quickly," she said. "I think it's important for students to be aware there are other options. Cheating is never the good option.

"An honor code says this is something we won't accept, and it won't be allowed here. If it becomes something that is accepted or the perception is that it happens a lot at a university, then the value of that degree is diminished."

While K-State gives leeway for students and offers second chances, students at the University of Virginia, after one violation, are expelled.

"The consequences for being found guilty of lying or cheating is permanent expulsion," Carey Mignerey, chair of the Honor Committee, said.

The honor system at Virginia, which has been in place for 161 years, is entirely student run with no administration oversight. The system is set up much like the judicial system.

Trained student investigators collect evidence and present their findings to an investigation panel made up of three honor committee members. That panel determines whether to send it to trial or to drop the charges.

The trial includes randomly-selected students who are required to fulfill their jury duty assignments.

"They are sent letters from our office. We eliminate students who indicate they would be biased against a race or gender," Mignerey said. "The trials are held on Saturday or Sunday and they usually last two and a half hours to 10 hours. They are overseen by a committee member who is the trial chair, and they are not held in strictly parliamentary fashion."

Any student found guilty is expelled from the university permanently if there are no appeals are granted.

"There is no mechanism for administrative involvement," Mignerey said. "The vice president for students affairs can only help students transferring to another university."

Mignerey said that surveys show only 7 percent of students at the University of Virginia cheat, in contrast to a New York Times poll that reported 40 percent of college students cheat.

Anderson said that while Virginia's system might appear to be successful, it is missing the diversity of having both faculty and students involved.

"I wouldn't want just a student-run system. I would say that just as emphatically if it were just faculty run," he said. "Students tend to be tougher. Students see the world in strong images of black and white. Faculty have more experience and see shades of gray."

Another flaw, he said, is not including lesser consequences such as K-State's use of the academic integrity course.

"We aren't a single-sanction system," Anderson said. "We believe if someone makes a mistake, they can be educated and try to show them this is the wrong way. We believe it's a form of student development."

Episcopalians consecrate 1st openly gay bishop

By Richard N. Ostling

Robinson
BISHOP

DURHAM, N.H. – The Episcopal Church became the first major Christian denomination to make an openly gay man a bishop, consecrating V. Gene Robinson on Sunday as bishop of New Hampshire. The act almost certainly means disgruntled conservatives will break from the church.

Robinson, 56, became a bishop when at least 40 other bishops attending his consecration surrounded him for the laying on of hands.

The historic moment came more than an hour into the ritual and after two Episcopal clerics and a parishioner took advantage of the traditional opportunity to object.

But the crowd of 4,000 worshippers attending the ceremony at a University of New Hampshire sports arena was overwhelmingly pro-Robinson. Presented to the audience at what's normally center ice, Robinson was greeted by a rousing, three-minute standing ovation. He smiled, nodded and brushed away a tear.

In informal remarks, Robinson's voice broke twice as he thanked New Hampshire for electing him a bishop and reaching out to the "people who find themselves at the margins," as Jesus did.

Conservatives have made moves to split from the church over Robinson and leaders of the global Anglican Communion have said his consecration puts their worldwide association, with 77 million members, in jeopardy.

Assistant Bishop David Bena of Albany, N.Y., spoke for 36 opposing bishops in the Episcopal Church and the Anglican Church of Canada. He said his group and most bishops in the international Anglican Communion will not recognize Robinson as a fellow bishop.

Reading from a statement, Bena said Robinson's "'chosen lifestyle' is incompatible with Scripture and the teaching of this church."

Bena spoke after Presiding Bishop Frank Griswold asked if there was "any reason why we should not proceed," a traditional part of Episcopal consecration services.

group, said he was impressed by the turnout.

"I was excited to see all the people there. It definitely was a packed house. It was good to see everyone was waiting on us and they was ready to party," he said.

"We have got a lot of new songs of the new CD that a lot of people knew the words to, and also they all knew our singles like "AwNaw" and "Po' Folks." We now have new songs like "Sick and Tired." You're going to see high-definition video of that in a couple of weeks," Prophet said.

Scales, another Nappy Roots member, said he could see the difference in the attitude of the audience compared to other cities.

"It's definitely a different region of the country," he said. "I sincerely appreciate the enthusiasm, even though they bounce is a different bounce out here, it's the same energy."

A former Division I basketball player, Scales compared playing basketball to his lifestyle as an entertainer.

"I miss being in shape," he said. "There ain't no way I can stay in shape and do this, in the environment we're in. But it takes the same teamwork. What I've been taught in basketball, I apply to music."

Group member Clutch described how Nappy Roots came to be.

"We all met up at college, Western Kentucky University, between the dates of 1993 and 1997," he said.

"We all had a big interest in music. We all love music, and we were free styling at a party. It was a producer in Bowling Green, sort of like a local producer that we all knew somehow or another. So we went from cassette tapes to CDs to Atlantic Records to 'Watermelon, Chicken & Gritz' to 'Wooden Leather.'"

The state of Kentucky has named September 18 as Nappy Roots Day.

"Jesus Christ, Martin Luther King, Lincoln, and Nappy Roots," Clutch said. "It's a great feeling – just to be recognized and have a state support you, get behind you and push you. Even though we got my man Scales, he's from Georgia, and Prophet, he's from Oakland, we all met in Kentucky, and that's like the birthplace of Nappy Roots," he said.

When asked about the possibility of another Grammy nomination, Clutch said Nappy Roots aims high.

"Forget a nomination, we're trying to win something," he said. "But no, we ain't ungrateful. Whatever the future holds."

Prophet said the group shows their gratefulness in a ritual they have when they perform.

"We pray before every show," he said. "Pray before every show and thank God for blessing us, for being able to do shows and being able to do what we liked and what we dreamed of."

People came from several different states to see Neak Frasty, Carrington said.

Members of the step show group from Zeta Phi Beta sorority hold up Ebonie Christon, who stares at the crowd of nearly 1,300 at McCain Auditorium Saturday night. Zeta won the step competition beating out two other sororities at the Neak Frasty step show and concert.

"We had people from Colorado, from Oklahoma, from Nebraska, from Missouri," he said.

"There were some people from Texas there, and I think there were some people from as far as Iowa."

The evening began with a step show that three sororities and two fraternities from K-State and other schools competed in. The groups combined music, dancing, jokes and high-energy stomping and clapping in their routines.

In the men's category, the judges chose the Western Missouri College chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity as the winners. The K-State Zeta Phi Beta sorority won the women's competition.

Daniellee Preston, senior in human ecology and president of Zeta Phi Beta, said the seven-girl group put a lot of time and work into the step show.

"We started working on that step show in the end of July, early August," she said. "In October we started practicing a lot of hours – Monday, Wednesday and Thursday from 6 to 9."

The practice of stepping, Preston said, is part of her sorority's heritage.

"The stepping comes from African and Swahili dances," she said. "We Americanize and modernize it. That's where we get it from, and that's why we keep it alive. We can't do the actual African dances, but we do what we can just to keep the heritage alive."

Chris Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Steve Washington, strength and conditioning worker, performs at Neak Frasty with the rest of the Omega Psi Phi fraternity. Omega Psi Phi finished second in the step show competition.

Preston said that Zeta Phi Beta has a history of winning step shows.

"Our sorority's name and the quality of stepping we do has been very successful. Our sorority is known for winning the step show," she said.

"We really try to make sure that it was crowd-appealing. People came up to us afterward and told us how they enjoyed it," she said.

ON THE MENU

By adolescence, we have developed all the cognitive ability we need to recognize peanut butter as a necessary staple in our diet.

SETH BISHOP

However, there exists a right-wing conspiracy in this country, an Anti-Peanut Butter Eating Society, if you will, dedicated to underplaying the importance of peanut butter in the world of adult cuisine.

As students at a major university, dear readers, you are the leaders of tomorrow.

I implore you – as you ponder the ozone, the Gaza strip, the 20 cents a gallon difference in gas prices from KC to Manhattan – to take time, dedicate resources and give America "Skippy in every pot!"

Take one bite of a peanut butter and banana sandwich, and you will never use the adjective "mere" to describe it again!

From PB&J to PB&B, peanut butter has a definite presence in the sandwich niche.

Let's look at some easy, delicious, and non-sandwich ways to enjoy the delicacy that is peanut butter.

I've stirred peanut butter into vanilla ice cream, used it as a pancake topping, even flavored my Ramen Noodles. Though, I'm still working on that last one.

Add 1/2 cup Peanut Butter to 2 lbs. ground beef, salt and pepper and fry your hamburgers as usual, then watch their eyes widen as their teeth sink into a Goober Burger.

Peanut butter continues its litany of uses: thicken soups and sauces, make melted chocolate smoother, peanut butter fudge, peanut butter cookies and finally, the quintessential peanut butter pie.

Peanut Butter Pie

2 oz. Cream Cheese
1 C. Powdered Sugar
1/2 C. Half and Half
1 tsp. Vanilla
1 C. Peanut Butter
1 1/2 C. Whipping Cream
Chocolate Cookie Crumb Crust

1. Combine cream cheese, sugar, cream, vanilla and peanut butter.
2. Chill a small bowl and beaters in the freezer.
3. Whip the cream in the chilled bowl until very stiff.
4. Add 1/3 of the whipped cream to the peanut butter mixture and then fold back into the remaining whipped cream.
5. Spoon into the prepared chocolate cookie crumb crust.

I have made this recipe substituting strawberry ice cream topping or caramel apple dip for the peanut butter.

Even now all the voices in my head would extol its virtues, except their tongue is stuck to the roof of my mouth.

Wildcat defense stuffs Baylor as win launches K-State into division lead

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In Las Vegas, the odds makers picked K-State to beat Baylor by 40.

But by halftime of Saturday's 38-10 Wildcat victory, more than a few gamblers were sweating bullets.

K-State gave up a field goal on the game's opening drive and a kickoff return for a touchdown, taking a slim 14-10 lead into the locker room.

"We got off to a real slow start," Roberson said. "A team came out with nothing to lose and they threw everything at us. We just had to come out second half and make some adjustments and play a lot better."

Play better they did.

Darren Sproles exploded, Ell Roberson keyed in and the defense stonewalled as K-State torched Baylor for 24 unanswered points.

Baylor opened the game looking for an upset. On the first play, quarterback Aaron Karas threw 43 yards to Marcus Venus, setting up the Bears' field goal and taking an early lead.

The Wildcats took the lead in the second quarter with a James Terry touchdown catch, but the momentum boost was short-lived as Robert Quiroga scored a touchdown on K-State's kick off.

The Cats would respond, again to Terry, on a 98-yard touchdown drive. K-State took a 14-10 lead with 26 seconds left in the half.

"We just tried to get them off balance because they were running a lot of crazy stuff," Roberson said of the long drive. "We just tried to do some hurry-up offense. Guys made some great catches down the stretch and we got the ball in the end zone when we needed to."

Sproles contained most of the gains, just 30 yards on 16 carries into the fourth quarter. But on two similar counter plays, he took off to the right and cut back across the field, taking the ball to Baylor's seven- and one-yard-lines on back to back drives.

"It probably sends a message to just keep trucking," Snyder said. "Sooner or later, something good can happen. It also has to do with him being an extremely capable running back."

The resulting touchdowns sealed K-State's seventh victory of the season and bumped the Cats into a tie for the Big 12 North lead.

2 Cats earn Big 12 honors

Chesang, Murer each finish 5th, lead team

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the K-State cross country teams, it was too bad the cold front that swept through Manhattan last week didn't reach the heart of Texas.

While the top Wildcat runners excelled, some struggled with temperatures in the 80s and high humidity, as the Wildcat men and women finished ninth and seventh, respectively, at Friday's Big 12 Conference Championships in Austin, Texas.

Junior Mathew Chesang and freshman Stefanie Murer each placed fifth, earning all-conference honors given to the top 15 runners in the men's and women's races.

Chesang's finish made him the second runner in K-State men's cross country history to finish fifth or higher at the conference championships.

Coach Randy Cole said Chesang – who finished in a time of 24:51 – started the race slowly but came on strong at the end.

"Mathew was patient the first half of the race, then just continued to work his way up," Cole said. "He gauged his opponents real well."

Murer had the top performance for a Big 12 freshman with her time of 21:43.

"She proved she's up there with the top competition around," Cole said. "Stefanie could end up being an All-American level runner before her career is done."

Sophomore Rogers Kipchumba and junior Trisha Culbertson also finished in the upper-tier of the field. Kipchumba's time of 25:40 earned him 25th place, while Culbertson placed 16th with a time of 22:23.

However, other Wildcat runners struggled in conditions Cole felt they were not prepared for, due in part to the K-State continued to rock and roll Saturday night in Boulder, Colo., handing conference foe Colorado a 3-1 loss.

The win extended the Cats' winning streak to 10 matches, and K-State has won 22 of the last 23 overall.

Four Cats eclipsed the 10-kill mark, with Valeria Hejjas leading the way with 20. Also chipping in were Lauren Goehring (18), Cari Jensen (16) and Lisa Martin (11).

Coach Suzie Fritz said she was particularly impressed with the play of Jensen, saying that she put together an outstanding overall performance.

"Cari Jensen played very, very well," Fritz said. "She passed very well, and she attacked very well."

K-State jumped out to an early lead by taking game one 30-24. Highlighted by a 9-0 run on the serving of Kris Jensen, the Cats were able to hold off the Buffaloes.

Game two belonged to Colorado, however, as the Buffaloes took a 30-20 decision. In the game, K-State was plagued by a .000 hitting percentage while committing 14 attacking errors.

Fritz said that it was these errors that doomed the Cats in the second game.

"We defended their left side attack very well, but we made too many unforced errors early in the match and that's how game two got away from us," Fritz said. "Once we started playing with a little more consistency, then I did think we were playing well."

The Cats came back in game three, winning 30-26 and taking a 2-1 lead. Leading 17-9, the Cats held off a Colorado charge as the Buffaloes rallied back to trail by only 22-17.

The K-State women's golf team concludes its fall season Monday and Tuesday at the Edwin Watts/Palmetto Intercollegiate in Charleston, S.C. The 54-hole tournament will pit K-State against 16 other schools, including Big 12 Conference rivals Oklahoma and Missouri.

Boucher

At last year's Edwin Watts/Palmetto, Wildcat senior Christine Boucher shot six-over to finish second. Boucher is the second-highest ranked golfer going into this year's event.

Equestrian | Wildcats win both days of Western show

Entering the show, K-State trailed Black Hawk in Region 2, Zone 9 by two points, but two wins moved K-State ahead of Black Hawk by six points.

The Wildcats now have two weeks off before the Western team competes in its final event of the fall season, a two-day show in Columbia, Mo.

Football | Cats still getting votes in polls

K-State got 38 votes in the ESPN/USA Today Coaches Poll, which would rank the Wildcats 30th in the nation, following their 38-10 win over Baylor on Saturday. K-State also received five votes in the Associated Press Top 25, which also ranks them 30th.

Okayo won the New York race for the second time, crossing the line in 2 hours, 22 minutes, 31 seconds. She shattered her 2001 course record by nearly two minutes.

Lel was timed in 2:10:30. Defending champion Rodgers Rop of Kenya was second among the men in 2:11:11 and countryman Christopher Cheboiboch was third in 2:11:23.

Free shuttle service provided for international students

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Friday mornings are now filled with errands: Aldi's, Wal-Mart, Dillons and the final stop, the International Grocery Store.

As a part of the Global Education Initiative, K-State voted to allow shuttle rides to and from KCI Airport and around Manhattan for international students. The money is allocated from the Office of International Programs' budget.

Mary Beth Cook, graduate student in public administration and research assistant for International Programs, said the program costs about $600 for its first year.

Cook said the shuttle service runs every Friday, twice a day.

She said the morning shuttles are less popular than the afternoon shuttles.

"When we started the shuttle on October 1, the mornings were more popular. Now the afternoons are much more popular," Cook said.

The shuttle's popularity hasn't caused any problems yet, Cook said.

"We haven't had any problems yet with not having enough spaces in the van. When we do have more people that know about it, we'd like to maybe start a weekend shuttle. Jardine has a Saturday shuttle, but it's only every 15 days," Cook said. "Someday, we may be able to work out an agreement with them to combine and do more shuttles."

Sometime, we may be able to convince the city that a shuttle is necessary for Manhattan and then won't have to worry about the international student shuttle anymore," Cook said.

Dimitry Shilor, graduate student in business administration from Russia, said Friday was his first time riding the shuttle.

"I think this is a really good service for international students. Most of us don't have a car and not many friends, so it is nice they can provide a ride to the store for us," Shilor said.

Shilor said the International Programs office has helped him since he first arrived in Kansas.

"I had trouble finding an apartment when I first arrived, they helped me find one and even advised me when I signed the agreement," Shilor said. "They have done a good job for us and makes everyone feel like they have a family here."

Shilor said he was having a Halloween party and was wanting to buy a costume.

"I am waiting for Wal-Mart to buy a costume. A girl suggested that I buy a Dracula costume," Shilor said.

Russell Musthafa, whose wife is a post-doctoral student at K-State and is from South India, said he appreciates the service offered by the International Programs office.

"It is definitely a good thing for those who don't have a vehicle. I am able to buy all sorts of stuff," Musthafa said.

Musthafa said he rides the shuttle quite a bit.

"I have come many times in the mornings for the shuttle," Musthafa said.

Cook said there are several people in offices around campus that are helpful in driving the vehicle when the shuttle goes to KCI.

"There are people in the ELP, the International Student Center and in the International Programs office that are available and willing to drive to Kansas City," Cook said.

Cook said the shuttle service is in only its second month of operation, and the shuttle couldn't pick students up from KCI in August.

The shuttle will pick up and deliver students to KCI as needed at the beginning and end of each semester.

"Most people have already purchased their tickets to go back home, so we may not be able to get them back, depending on what time they need to be there," Cook said. "Hopefully, we can successfully get some tentative schedules together so they can get a ticket that leaves in a certain time frame."

FOOTBALL | Terry and Roberson developing championship chemistry

Terry, dragging both feet in bounds, extended all 6-foot-5 of himself and pulled in the pass to put K-State up 7-3.

"I'm interested to go back and see it," Snyder said after the game. "I'm standing on the sideline and thinking that ball is way out of bounds. I was thinking that was a gross overthrow. It's a great catch – a great play."

Terry's second touchdown reception put K-State ahead once again. Trailing 10-7, Roberson marched the Wildcats 98 yards in under four minutes, capping the drive with a 14-yard bullet to a diving Terry in the opposite corner of the endzone.

"Sometimes you can just throw it up, and he'll go get it," Roberson said of Terry's catch. "He missed some easy passes today but made some tough ones. When you have a guy like that you just let him do his thing."

The final Roberson-to-Terry strike came on the opening drive of the second half, a 39-yard bomb down the sideline in which Terry outran the coverage. That score sparked three unanswered touchdowns that sealed the victory.

Co-offensive coordinator Del Miller said the connection between Roberson and Terry is an emerging story in the Wildcats' success.

"I like the chemistry that he and Ell are developing," Miller said. "They have a real good feel for each other – Ell for how James is going to run around and where he's going to be. We like that."

Miller also liked Roberson's performance, which included 242 yards through the air and the three touchdown strikes to Terry, as well as 79 yards rushing and another touchdown.

And all that came without throwing an interception, something Roberson hasn't done in the Cats' last three games. In that time, he's thrown for 622 yards and seven touchdowns while rushing for another five scores.

While K-State didn't perform up to its expectations – the 40-point spread was more than safe, particularly when the Bears nearly led at halftime – Roberson and Terry proved more than enough.

"We got off to a real slow start," Roberson said, "but we made some adjustments and took what they gave us."

much for Colorado to handle, and kills by Hejjas and Martin, as well as blocks from Goehring and Michaela Franklin, sealed the win.

After trading points early in game four, the Cats led 25-20 late in the match. Kills from Martin, Goehring and Cari Jensen sealed the deal, as the Cats took the game 30-22 to clinch the victory.

The key to the victory, Fritz said, was the way her squad played offensively.

"There were things that we did well," Fritz said. "We ball controlled pretty well – I thought we served very aggressively."

Fritz gave the credit for this aggressiveness to the play of her passing attack.

"Lauren had another good night," Fritz said. "Actually, all of our passers passed real well. Cari, Laura and Kris all passed real well. Cari had a real nice night offensively and Lauren had a real nice night offensively."

squad's youth.

"The heat hurts those runners who aren't as strong mentally, and part of the learning curve is being able to adjust to the conditions," Cole said.

Wildcats were not the only runners who appeared to be losing the fight with the heat.

"People were staggering and some runners had to have IV's," said Cole, who added that no K-State runner had to receive medical attention.

Coming as no surprise, the Colorado men and women continued their strangle-hold on the conference, both capturing team titles. The Colorado men have won every Big 12 championship in the conference's history, while the women have won all but one.

Cole, however, realizes at this point in the season endurance is hard to increase.

"Fitness levels can't get any higher, but we just need to stay sharp the next few weeks," he said.

As the season reaches its pinnacle, Cole is confident his runners have yet to turn in their best work.

"Even our top runners who've raced well – I think everybody has their best races ahead of them," Cole said.

HELICOPTER | Attack results in dead, wounded

The loaded-down Chinook was a dramatic new target. The insurgents have been steadily advancing in their weaponry, first using homemade roadside bombs, then rocket-fired grenades in ambushes on American patrols, and vehicles stuffed with explosives and detonated by suicide attackers.

Though a few villagers tried to help, many celebrated word of the helicopter downing, as well as a fresh attack on U.S. soldiers in Fallujah itself. Two American civilians working under contract for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers were killed and one was injured in the explosion of a roadside bomb, the military said.

"This was a new lesson from the resistance, a lesson to the greedy aggressors," one Fallujah resident, who would not give his name, said of the helicopter downing. "They'll never be safe until they get out of our country," he said of the Americans.

The downed copter was one of two Chinooks flying out in formation from an air base in Habbaniyah, about 10 miles from the crash site, carrying troops to Baghdad on route for rest and recreation – R&R.

The missiles seemed to have been fired from a palm grove about 500 yards away, Thaer Ali, 21, said. At least one hit the Chinook, which came down in a field in the farming village of Hasai, a few miles south of Fallujah, witnesses said.

The missiles flashed toward the helicopter from the rear, as usual with heat-seeking ground-fired missiles. The most common model in the former Iraqi army inventory was the Russian-made SA-7, also known as Strelas.

Hours later, thick smoke rose from the blackened, smoldering hulk as U.S. soldiers swarmed over the crash site, evacuating the injured, retrieving evidence and cordoning off the area.

Yassin Mohamed said he heard the explosion and ran out of his house, a half-mile away.

"I saw the helicopter burning. I ran toward it because I wanted to help put out the fire, but couldn't get near because of American soldiers," he said.

The U.S. military would not confirm that the aircraft was struck by a missile, but a spokesman, Col. William Darley, said witnesses reported seeing "missile trails."

In Baghdad, Darley said the CH-47 helicopter belonged to the 12th Aviation Brigade, a Germany-based unit that supports the 82nd Airborne Division Task Force operating west of Baghdad.

The two Chinooks were carrying a total of more than 50 passengers to the U.S. base at Baghdad International Airport, from which they were to fly out on leave, U.S. officials said. Darley said some of the casualties were from medical units, but officials did not provide a breakdown of their units.

DEFENSE | Sproles and Roberson put up big yards

Sproles finished the day with 155 yards rushing and seven yards receiving, but he was also electric in returning kicks. Tacking on 20 yards worth of punt returns and three kick returns for 126 yards, he accounted for 308 all-purpose yards.

The day was the second-best all-around yardage performance in K-State history.

Roberson connected on 14-of-24 passing, including three touchdowns to Terry, and finished with 242 yards passing.

He also added 79 yards on the ground for one touchdown.

Often criticized at the start the season and during K-State's three-game losing streak, K-State defenders allowed 228 total yards and limited Baylor to a single field goal.

By keeping the Bears out of the end zone, the defense hasn't allowed a touchdown since Colorado.

"It makes you proud that they haven't gotten the ball in the end zone, but we're looking for shutouts," defensive end Andrew Shull said. "Until our defense gets one of those I don't think we're going to be satisfied."

11th Fort Riley soldier killed in Iraq; name not released

357 U.S. soldiers killed in Iraq as of Monday

James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An 11th Fort Riley soldier was killed in Iraq on Friday, but Fort Riley officials would not release his name.

The soldier's wife and parents must be notified before any information can be released, said Deb Skidmore, public affairs officer at Fort Riley.

The Department of Defense is in charge of notifying the family and releasing the information before the soldier's home fort is allowed to release any information, Skidmore said.

Skidmore would not give any information on the soldier or how he was killed.

On Monday, the Associated Press reported that 357 American soldiers had been killed during the operation, in addition to 50 British soldiers.

The Fort Riley soldier's death came two days before a helicopter was attacked in Baghdad, Iraq, killing 16 American soldiers.

One clue in Sunday's helicopter shootdown may lie in Ramadi, west of the crash site, where an anti-U.S. leaflet warned, just two days before the shootdown, that Iraq's insurgents would strike the Americans with "modern and advanced methods."

The downing of the CH-47 Chinook, one of two carrying dozens of soldiers on their way to Baghdad airport and home leave, killed 16 Americans and wounded 20 others. It was the heaviest U.S. death toll in any single action since the invasion of Iraq last March 20.

Learning to cope

Imagine waking up with a blinding pain in your abdomen that is so bad, you can't even get out of bed.

You lay there, praying for it to go away, but there is no release.

Cheryl Mueller, freshman in elementary education, has days like these. Mueller has a chronic illness called Crohn's disease, a disease that affects the intestinal region.

"They have no idea what the cause is, and they have no idea how to fix it or cure it, Mueller said."

"It's an abnormal immune response," she said. "It is thought that it can be inherited, but there's no clear-cut causal factor – it's an auto-immune response, like when you have hay fever."

The symptoms are very uncomfortable, Lee said.

"The symptoms can include loose, watery stool, lower abdominal pain, cramping, fever and rectal bleeding," she said. "The treatment is an auto-immune suppressant. The medicines we use help to suppress the inflammatory response of the disease, which in turn relieves the symptoms. In extreme cases, patients have to have part of the bowel removed if it's diseased, which is called an anastomosis."

Crohn's is a lifelong disease, and those who have it must try to keep it from flaring up, Lee said.

"Stress may cause a flare-up, but, for the most part, patients can live a normal life," she said.

Although she has a chronic illness, Mueller said it does not affect her on a daily basis.

"I can wake up most mornings and feel fine," she said. "There will be some mornings, though, where I can't get out of bed. I just lay there holding my stomach because I'm in so much pain."

There are a lot of students with chronic illnesses at K-State, said Gretchen Holden, director of disability support services.

"Students with chronic health impairments are covered by the Americans with Disabilities Act, which was passed in 1990," she said. "Students come to our office to talk about what accommodations would be appropriate for them. If there is a student with rheumatoid arthritis that can't climb stairs, we can move class to a place with an elevator."

Other accommodations have been made, Holden said.

"We had a student with cystic fibrosis who couldn't take evening tests, so we gave her those tests here in the after-

Fast facts
Crohn's disease

- Crohn's disease is a chronic (ongoing) disorder that causes inflammation of the digestive or gastrointestinal tract.
- 60 percent of those diagnosed are under 30 years old. 17 percent are under 20.
- An estimated 500,000 people in the United States have Crohn's disease.
- Although considerable progress has been made in inflammatory bowel disease research, investigators do not yet know what causes Crohn's.

Cheryl Mueller, freshman in elementary education, works on homework Thursday in Moore Hall. Despite being diagnosed with Crohn's disease as a sophomore in high school, Mueller tries to live as normal a life as possible.

Outside of dietary restrictions, the most noticeable change to Mueller's daily schedule is the pills she must take three times per day.

Pack the library to ask for money

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the second year in a row, students will pick up their picket signs and raise their voices in the name of more money for higher-education.

Last year's event was in protest of mid-year cuts, where after hours were cut because of lack of funding. This year's event targets both state funding and tuition increases.

"Students are paying their bills and are very aware there is a problem," Student Senate Chair Laurie Quaife said. "The first year, one tuition increase was a problem. Two increases was an even bigger problem. Some students haven't been able to return to Kansas State, and we are afraid a third round is going to make even more students unable to return the next year."

The rally begins at 7 p.m. with picketing outside Hale Library. At 8 p.m., students will begin writing letters to Kansas legislators.

For those who complete their letter, there will be free pizza, sandwiches and pop, said Ben Procter, arts and sciences senator.

The night will conclude with speeches by local and state officials. Legislators in attendance will be Rep. Roger Reitz, R-Manhattan; Rep. Sydney Carlin, R-Manhattan; Rep. Jim Morrison; Kansas Sen. Steve Morris; and congressional candidate Nancy Boyda, as well as K-State administrators and Kansas Board of Regents member Nelson Galle.

Students fighting for funding of higher-education really does make a difference, Procter said.

"I do think last year's rally made a difference," he said. "We have had members of the Legislature ask if we were planning on repeating this. It drew attention to the level of activism we can have here at K-State."

Quaife said K-State has a chance to send a message to the legislators as well as to the state of Kansas.

"Students will have the chance to actually vocalize their concerns to their actual representatives as well as media coverage from all over the state of Kansas to let legislators know that students are concerned about this and are willing to get out and make a statement," she said.

Kansas universities rally for funding with forums, letters

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While K-State students participate in the Pack the Library Night this evening, other universities are planning their own events to get legislators' attention.

The Kansas Board of Regents institutions have committed to lobbying for more state funding of higher-education.

At the University of Kansas, there will be a town hall meeting Nov. 20 at the new Dole Institute.

"We will have local legislators, KU administrators and basically some people who are experts on the whole issue of higher-education funding to answer questions and talk to students and other people about what it is going to take to improve higher-education in Kansas," Student Body President Andy Knopp said.

Leading up to the forum, student government officials will be conducting letter-writing campaigns, Knopp said.

"We will have outlines of some key points for students to write to their local legislators and to talk about what they are going to have to do to get through school and what higher-education funding means to them," he said.

Emporia State University had a similar forum Tuesday evening with a question-and-answer session with state legislators. They will have a letter-writing campaign later this year or early spring, Christina Kerns, associated student government

Iraq funding
Congress voted its final approval Monday for $87.5 billion for U.S. military operations and aid in Iraq and Afghanistan. The Senate approved the bill by voice and handed a legislative victory to President Bush, who had requested a similar package two months ago.

Attack investigation
American troops hunted for anti-aircraft missiles along Iraq's trucking routes, digging through heaps of manure or mounds of hay or piles Monday. The U.S. Army retrieved the wreckage of a downed transport helicopter and searched for clues about who knocked it from the sky.

Blackout investigation
A U.S.-Canadian task force essentially has completed its interim report and will cite a number of causes, not merely a single event, for the massive power blackout last August, Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham said Monday. The findings could come as early as next week.

WEIRD NEWS BY CHUCK SHEPHERD

AMERICA'S REAL GUN PROBLEM

People Who Recently Failed to Get Out of the Line of Their Own Fire:

■ Jonathan Rodriguez, 17, Newark, Del. (a home-invasion suspect who batted on a door with the butt of his handgun, which fired into his groin; July).

■ Joshua Michael Short, 18, Houston (got up from a table at Memorial City Mall food court and bumped the gun that was in his waistband, firing a round into his buttocks; July).

■ Detroit police officer Michael Allen, 22 (tried to cram his gun under the front seat of his car at a Canadian border-crossing, but it discharged into his leg; July).

TROOPS WAITING FOR PROTECTION

As of mid-October (six months after the so-called fall of Baghdad), nearly one-fourth of U.S. troops in Iraq still had not been issued life-saving Interceptor ceramic body armor and were using comparatively porous Vietnam-era flak jackets, according to an Associated Press report quoting congressional sources.

PEOPLE DIFFERENT FROM US

Mr. Ashrita Furman, 48, claims the world record for breaking world records (81, 20 of which are still recognized by the Guinness Book), demonstrating extraordinary but fanciful skills, such as the fastest mile run while balancing a bottle of milk on his chin, unicycling backward for 53 miles and pogo-stick jumping (3,647). According to a June New York Times profile, Furman is a celibate bachelor with few possessions and lives quietly in an Indian-American community in Jamaica, N.Y.

HOW TO DRIVE A CONSERVATIVE NUTS

In September, a British government-funded charity, Family Planning Association, distributed a cartoon booklet teaching the joys of masturbation to a target audience of 9- to 11-year-old girls. Also in September, the British teen community-service organization Connexions distributed a primer on marijuana smoking printed on a poster resembling a package of rolling papers. The University of Michigan at Ann Arbor this semester offered another edition of its sociology course, "How to Be Gay: Male Homosexuality and Initiation" (but its creator said "initiation" is a sociological term and does not refer to initiation of straight students).

UNDIGNIFIED DEATHS

A San Francisco Giants fan was killed at Pacific Bell Park on Sept. 17 after his sunglasses fell to the ground during a game, and he hit his head falling from a light pole trying to retrieve them. A 17-year-old girl accidentally fell to her death after sitting on a 15th-floor ledge, to which she had retreated to get away from cigarette smoke during a party.

Douglas Lecture speaker discusses free legal advice

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 15-state network of free legal advice, dubbed the Nebraska Appleseed, was the topic of Milo Mumgaard's speech at the Lou Douglas Lecture on Monday night.

The speech, sponsored by UFM Community Learning Center, was titled "Public Interest Law in a Private Interest Age: The Nebraska Experience."

Mumgaard, executive director for Appleseed Center, said public interest law at his center is for "equal justice and voice for the underprivileged."

Mumgaard spoke mostly of the purpose of the Appleseed centers across the nation, then moved to a more localized view of public interest law in the Midwest.

"Public interest law is often viewed as debilitating, but our circumstances in the Midwest can demonstrate to urban societies we have something extra," Mumgaard said.

The Appleseed centers, which were started for poor and underprivileged Nebraskan's in 1996, will set up a center in Lawrence, Kan., in the future, Mumgaard said.

Mumgaard said welfare reform could better be labeled "radical reform" because of its "dramatic failure in public policy."

Mumgaard and other attorneys at the Nebraska Appleseed Center recently won a class-action lawsuit awarding medicare coverage back to 10,000 single mothers. They represent groups and work on their behalf, free of charge.

Mumgaard said, "We are now working to make a new definition of public interests and public interest law."

Mumgaard said his center doesn't side themselves with political values.

"We aren't part of a political party, we speak in values and principles in what most people would call a progressive point of view," Mumgaard said.

"I think the idea of these people addressing situations through not a political stance, but through principles was most beneficial," Krehbiel said.

Allison VonRein, freshman in open-option, said the entirety of Mumgaard's speech will benefit her in the future.

"Learning about the different problems people have been faced with and helping in their own community will prove the best in the future," VonRein said.

Mumgaard summed up his speech by relating to his own community in the Midwest.

"We can find the heart America, here in the heart of America, and do something with it," Mumgaard said.

Police charge driver in crash at Bush speech with aggravated assault

By Shelia Hardwell Byrd
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JACKSON, Miss. – A woman whose car rammed into the side of an arena where President Bush had just delivered a speech faces state assault charges, although no federal charges were expected, authorities said.

Chief David Mitchell, spokesman for the DeSoto County sheriff's department, said Betina Mixon was charged Sunday with two counts of aggravated assault on a police officer.

Federal officials said Mixon, 29, of Horn Lake, had no intention of harming the president and no federal charges were pending. No date was set for her arraignment on the state charges.

Mixon appeared briefly Monday in county court, where an attorney was appointed for her. She is being held without bond.

Bush had just spoken at a campaign rally Saturday for Haley Barbour, the Republican nominee for governor, and was in his limousine preparing to leave the DeSoto County Civic Center when the crash occurred outside, a senior administration official said.

The president left the arena less than five minutes later from an exit about 40 yards from the crash. Three children were in the car Mixon crashed.

Witnesses said they saw a gray Toyota Camry drive through a parking lot, jump the curb, drive through a gate where press buses had just left and ram the building near a loading dock.

Her car was pursued by a four-wheeled motorcycle and other law enforcement for several hundred feet, according to an Associated Press reporter who witnessed the incident.

The Secret Service has reviewed the incident and concluded that its layered security procedures worked, spokeswoman Ann Roman said Monday.

Each presidential appearance has a contingency plan to confront such breaches. "In this incident, the contingency plan worked as planned," Roman said. She declined to say what that plan was.

Sebelius to address education

Governor to propose a vision for public education

By John Milburn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – Gov. Kathleen Sebelius promised Monday the courtroom will not be the only place school finance policy will be aired in the coming months.

During an interview in her office with The Associated Press, the first-term governor said she would outline a proposal in the coming months with her vision for Kansas public education.

That proposal is likely to come after Shawnee County District Judge Terry Bullock rules on a 1999 challenge to the state's formula for distributing more than $2.6 billion in aid to elementary and secondary schools. An appeal is expected in the case, which is scheduled for final arguments at the district level before Bullock on Nov. 25, but Sebelius said that shouldn't preclude discussions in the Statehouse.

"The legislative leadership, unfortunately, said we're not going to talk about school finance until 2005," Sebelius said. "I want to talk about it in 2004, and I'm going to put it on the agenda and talk about it around the state."

Sebelius named a 27-member Education Policy Team in January, led by former Board of Regents member Sylvia Robinson, which developed a series of recommendations following the team's own meetings and a series of statewide public forums.

"People wanted to be asked their opinions, wanted an opportunity to weigh in, and I think it sets the stage for the future," Sebelius said.

The intended results of the recommendations include high academic performance for all students, access to quality early childhood programs, coordination of early childhood funding, improved graduation rates, and strengthening family, business and community commitments.

Sebelius wouldn't share the details of what the final package to legislators would contain or how much it would cost.

"I'll tell you later," she said.

However, the governor has said previously she thought a reasonable goal would be a proposal from Denver consultants Augenblick & Myers, who said Kansas needs to increase education spending by $852 million _ or to about $4,650 per pupil _ to provide a suitable education by the state's own definition.

Such an increase would require a sizable tax increase. Legislators have been reluctant in the past to increase school spending, having never increased the per-pupil amount by more than $50 in any year since 1992.

During her first year in office, Sebelius promised to protect education from further budget cuts. Gov. Bill Graves cut aid to public schools by $27 per pupil, to $3,863, in August 2002.

Schools received the same figure for the current school year, though many districts raised local property taxes or cut programs to keep up with increased costs for insurance, teacher salaries and utilities.

Sebelius described her proposal as a three-step process. The first was stabilizing the budget and the second was gathering public comment.

"This session will be sort of step three, laying out a plan, saying, 'Here is what we'll need to do in education,'" she said.

Sebelius said she hoped to "get the Legislature, then, to buy into what I think Kansans have already begun to say are important priorities."

Students take stand, rally for state support

Dear Kansas Legislators,

K-State students are meeting at Hale Library tonight to write letters asking you to support higher education.

We are united in our purpose, having suffered drastic tuition increases for two consecutive years.

While we understand this is a time of fiscal crisis, necessitating budget cuts in all aspects of government activity, it is time you stop cutting into higher education.

Somehow, despite your decreased support of our education, we have been able to not only survive, but even set aside a small portion of tuition revenues for university enhancements.

We have been stretched; we have done our fair share of belt-tightening in these tough times. We have done all we can to thrive and prosper during a financially difficult time.

Now, we ask you to reciprocate the effort by taking some of the growing burden back off our buckling shoulders.

Can we students feasibly continue to pay for the shortfalls in state funding?

Tonight, K-State students will answer that question with a resounding "No."

Sincerely,
The Kansas State Collegian Editorial Board

Feminist or mother?

Working women and moms have important roles

NASRINA WILLIAMS

I've started to notice something that disturbs me. There seems to be a division among many of my female peers here at K-State.

I'm going to call it the feminist-versus-mommy division.

So many of the women in my age group seem to perceive either the word "mommy" or the word "feminist" as the dirtiest word in the English language.

These women express their desires to have successful careers. They say they will not allow childbearing to infringe upon their lives.

Some of them do not plan to have children, while others state they will have children, but will utilize daycare and other resources to do so without any unnecessary interruption in their careers.

They perceive the mommy camp as being full of women who are simply at this university to earn a degree and then waste their education by becoming stay-at-home moms.

It seems they perceive the mommy word as the source of gender oppression and thus they seek equality by rejecting their own reproductive potential.

They think that "feminist" is just a nice way of describing a woman who is a bra-burning, man-hating, lesbian feminazi.

These women want to get their degrees, but many do not have career ambitions.

They plan to have careers, but will place their careers on hold indefinitely when they have children. Their life aspirations are primarily focused upon being a good mother, while their professional careers are secondary.

These women reject the idea of being feminists because they do not want to sacrifice their roles as nurturing, reproductive care givers. They see daycare as a decision to selfishly endanger a child.

There are many women who do not fall into either the feminist or mommy camps, but are stuck somewhere in the middle.

I fall into the third category, and am quite confused as to why there is so much division among women of my generation.

I am a feminist, but I also plan to spend a portion of my life as a full-time, stay-at-home mom. Am I contradicting myself?

The problem lies in the way that feminism is being defined.

It's a battle between the feminism of the 1970s – which invited women to reject society's definition of being a woman – and a modern resurgence of the desire to reclaim and embrace traditional components of femininity.

I think women can have their cake and eat it, too. A feminist can be a corporate attorney or a soccer mom. The conflict does not lie in a woman's career choices. It is in the way society places different amounts of value on those choices.

The most common definition of feminism is simply the idea that men and women are inherently equal, and neither is superior to the other. There is nothing in this definition that conflicts with a woman's decision to be a full-time mother.

However, our society has a history of placing value on certain types of work. Work that attains money and status in society has historically been considered more valuable than work that accrues little or no monetary compensation.

In today's world, work is not divided among the sexes in the same way. Women have successfully broken into traditionally male careers. The problem that remains is giving value and recognition to the care giving roles in our society.

Raising children and taking care of the home is one of the most essential positions in our society. Think about it, who does more essential work – a full-time mom or a corporate CEO?

If we make the choice to recognize and appreciate the importance of nurturing roles in society, then the mommy vs. feminist battle is reconciled.

This benefits both sexes, as it would also become more acceptable for men to assume the role of primary care giver.

Instead of couples having to argue about who will be forced to put their career on hold in order to raise a family, they could simply examine the situation from the point of view of what will be best for the family as a whole.

The solution is simple.

Recognize that doing dishes is important and essential work. Understand that a job that makes more money is not inherently superior to a job that is paid less. Realize that a society's children are its most precious natural resource.

Finally, acknowledge that both men and women have the capacity to be nurturing.

Recent Collegian letters manage to impress, confuse

JASON HEASER

I love democracy and I love the free press. Go First Amendment!

Why, you might ask, am I writing to reaffirm my loyalty to the standards of the good old United States?

It is because of the recent upsurge of letters to the editor that have been sent to and printed in the Collegian.

Some have been good, some have been bad and some have been a little angry, but they were all voices. These letters were written by individuals proud enough of their ideals and ambitions to make their voices heard, even with the potential Fourum backlash so often seen.

I am very proud and a little misty-eyed to see so many people voice their opinions and use the freedoms and rights granted us by our forefathers.

The ability to voice one's opinion for or against anything and actually have it printed is the greatest of rights, in my opinion.

As G. Norman Collie said, "In free countries, every man is entitled to express his opinions, and every other man is entitled not to listen."

It always surprises me, though, that students rarely will write to voice their opinion about issues pertaining to our campus.

Let's say I was to write about the current "marriage protection" resolution. Would I get more than a few quotes in the Fourum and be rebuked by numerous letters to the editor? You bet I would, and I would be glad to see it.

What if I took a stance on abortion or the fighting in Iraq?

Now we go to the other side of the coin.

What if I wrote about the demolition of Denison Hall or took a stance on the movement of Lafene Health Center? What if I voiced my view on student government as a whole here at K-State?

History maintains that little, if anything, would happen.

A few people might shake their heads, a few more might mutter something to a friend and a whole lot would look at the cool illustrations I always seem to get and jump right on down to the Fourum.

There was a time as early as last year when letters rebuking columnists were bountiful and colorful, though I will admit those columns contained a little more shock value. Still, it seemed students had been becoming somewhat apathetic of late.

Last year's 12 percent voter turnout at the student election polls, which included a policy question about a controversial smoking issue, is a clear indicator the vast majority – 88 percent for all you statisticians out there – of students just didn't care.

The recent influx of letters may be proving me wrong, though, and I hope they continue.

Again, I love that people, especially students, are making their opinions and views known and would like again to extend my thanks to all those brave enough to speak out with their name attached.

I think it is time for students to use those same energies and avenues in protest or support current policies here at K-State.

I would just like some proof that it doesn't have to be a core belief issue or a Restivo-ian controversy to get a rise out of students.

SGA, Collegian place too much emphasis on alternate lifestyles

Editor,

I would like to take this opportunity to strongly voice my opinion against the proposed marriage resolution being considered by what is supposed to be our Student Governing Association.

SGA and the editorial board of this paper have said the declaration made by the Manhattan city mayor was prejudicial to gays.

Nowhere in his declaration did he at any time make any comment about this subject.

It seems as if SGA and the Collegian editors think a conventional family should be made illegal, and the only lifestyle that should be supported is that of being a gay. Where would you be if it were not for your families?

It is time that you realize only a minority of the students on campus support your left-wing liberal slant on issues.

As a newspaper you should be willing to present an unbiased report, but you consistently have to report on sex, drinking or how Christians and married families are the root of all evil.

I sometimes am ashamed to admit I attend a school where it is considered wrong to be married and raise a family.

I guess that in order to be accepted by SGA and the Collegian editors, everyone that is married should get divorced and find a life partner of the same sex.

I guess that in order to be accepted by SGA and the Collegian editors, everyone that is married should get divorced and find a life partner of the same sex.

Well, I for one am against that and think that every student who feels the same way should let SGA know that we deserve to be respected.

Marriage Week attacks basic human rights

Editor,

I am writing this letter in response to the many debates and letters that have been published in the Collegian in the past few weeks regarding Marriage Protection Week.

I remember coming to K-State and hearing Pat Bosco speak to all incoming freshmen.

He said this campus is composed of many people – different religions, different orientations, different hometowns, different states and different countries. He asked us to reconsider coming to K-State if we could not handle that, because it might not be the right place for us. I agree.

First of all, in regards to this Marriage Protection Week, this proclamation not only affects the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender community, but also condemns any relationship that is not considered traditional.

That includes premarital relationships, divorces and single people. This proclamation not only affects gays and lesbians, but many others on our campus.

What about this "homosexual agenda?" As far as I am concerned, gays and lesbians have longed for happiness, fairness under the law and the right to live a long life with a significant other. Who knows, maybe children come into this equation.

If you ask me, that sounds a lot like the heterosexual agenda, doesn't it?

When we propagate things like this "Marriage Protection Week," we are assaulting basic human rights to all. There is no debate to that.

Others have claimed this only instills the values in which we all believe, but when you look at it, how can you say that exclusively reserving marriage for "one man and one woman" is anything but discriminating? Isn't a true American entitled to the pursuit of happiness?

As young adults, maturing in a very diverse environment, we must get over the fact that a lot of us were raised in Small Town, Kan., and come to realize we must all embrace each other as students and friends. It's time to grow up.

Morality may change, but basic rights remain

Editor,

Change is the order of all things. Morality is not static or innate commodity.

After all, it took the United States more than 100 years to redundantly recognize the basic and fundamental freedoms of the black men and women who we imported to our soil under less-than-human conditions to do less-than-human work, with little or no recognition of their abiding humanity.

Was this reversal a byproduct of the "African-American agenda"?

I think not. Instead, despite the necessary political redundancy, it was an awakening of finer moral impulses.

Those same impulses also drive us to know, deep in our hearts, that to embrace the family is not to find new ways to divide men and women apart from the love, honor and commitment they can find with each other – regardless of the sexual orientation governing their union.

Sanctity is not a privilege. It is granted by God, not by governments, municipalities, countries or ecclesiastical bodies. Why is it necessary to invoke our current president or current mayor unless you seek not a universal morality, but an encapsulated, temporal one?

To embrace the family and the fertile union of two loving and committed individuals is to embrace all that is best about an evolving sense of morality. To deny that public health, that personal sanctity, is bigoted, irreligious and ethically indefensible.

Yes, I did say "fertile" union. I consider the possibility of two people joined under God and committing themselves to each other to be a fertile union whether it produces children or not, whether children can be produced or not and whether each part of the union is of the same sex.

Cleverly, the "non-homosexual agenda" seeks to deny me that right, which is divinely and humanly mine, through legislative means.

Rally to catch legislators' attention

Editor,

In the last two years, K-State has lost $12 million in spending power because of budget cuts from the state legislature.

The faculty at K-State already are among some of the lowest paid in comparison to other universities and, with this loss in spending power, these teachers have been unable to see a raise.

K-State has lost superior faculty members because the university cannot compete with other universities' salary packages. I personally have seen an excellent professor who effected me leave K-State to work at another, higher-paying university.

Many departments have unfilled positions due to the lack of funding. As students, the value of our degrees depends on the quality of faculty and programs we have here.

If we want employers around the nation to respect the education we receive here, we need to have the money to attract and keep top faculty members. Students need to let the Kansas Legislature know how damaging these cuts have been and ask them to help protect the quality of our school.

Every student can help send this message to the state legislature by attending "Pack the Library: Rally for Higher Education." This rally will start 7 p.m. at Hale Library.

Please come support your education and K-State by helping send the message to state legislators about the importance of funding for higher education.

Habitat for humanity thankful for amount of cans recycled during contest

Editor,

On behalf of Manhattan Habitat for Humanity, I would like to thank the students, faculty and Collegian staff for all of their help with the KSU vs. KU Aluminum Challenge.

The University of Kansas finished the Challenge with 5,658 pounds of aluminum, while K-State came in with 2,164 pounds.

Despite the loss, Manhattan Habitat for Humanity is very proud of the effort put forth by those on campus and in our community. Our total amount of 2,164 pounds more than doubles the amount the Manhattan community generally recycles in a month.

Make A Difference Day, Oct. 25, fell on the same day as the K-State vs. KU home football game this year.

Through the Aluminum Association, Habitat for Humanity International began a program called Aluminum Cans Build Habitat for Humanity Homes.

This program encourages communities to recycle their aluminum cans for Habitat. The proceeds from the cans recycled then goes into a revolving fund to help build more homes for families in need in the Manhattan community.

Coupling these two events, Manhattan Habitat for Humanity challenged the Lawrence affiliate and KU's campus to a recycling challenge.

The KSU vs. KU Aluminum Challenge, therefore, served as Manhattan Habitat's service project for Make A Difference Day 2003.

Although the actual contest is over, I continue to challenge the students and faculty at K-State to recycle cans at Howie's Recycling, 10th Street and Fort Riley Boulevard, for Habitat.

We hope this challenge has opened eyes in the community to the benefits of recycling and that Manhattan residents will continue these habits for a beneficial cause.

Endangered species need protection

Editor,

While we concern ourselves with opposing or defending U.S. involvement in Iraq, watching the California election circus and the race – or limp – to the presidential elections, other news has gone under the radar of public notice.

As reported by the Washington Post, "The Bush administration is proposing far-reaching changes to conservation policies that would allow hunters, circuses and the pet industry to kill, capture and import animals on the brink of extinction in other countries.

"Giving Americans access to endangered animals," officials said, "would feed the gigantic U.S. demand for live animals, skins, parts and trophies and generate profits that would allow poor nations to pay for conservation of the remaining animals and their habitat."

Living in a culture, especially in Kansas, where many value hunting, it is important not to criticize those who hold different beliefs concerning the rights of animals.

Most Americans eat animals, whether they hunt for them on their own or buy them packaged.

Just as hunters who kill for food should not be criticized, differing beliefs should be respected, as well.

Some believe killing animals is no longer necessary since we have come to a point in our technological, agricultural and intellectual evolution which provides the opportunity for healthy lives without causing the pain and suffering of other sentient beings.

In a Washington Post article from Oct. 11, staff writer Shankar Vedantam writes, "The latest proposal involves an interpretation of the Endangered Species Act that deviates radically from the course followed by Republican and Democratic administrations since President Richard M. Nixon signed the act in 1973."

The current administration argues the proposed changes to laws concerning endangered species would provide for better protection, as existing laws have been ineffective.

No intelligent, critically-thinking, informed individual actually believes that without the existing laws protecting endangered species, more animals and species would have been saved.

"Survival of the fittest" does not take into account wanton slaughter for sport and amusement. These animals deserve to live freely, not to hang on the walls of trophy hunters.

Funds shrinking for facility facelifts

By Andi Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When it comes to facilities, the Department of Inter-collegiate Athletics has a master list of jobs they would like to see completed.

As far as revenue goes, it just can't keep up.

"We don't have enough excess revenue from football or any of our revenue-producing sports to allow us to do these kind of facility things as a part of our operating budget," Director of Athletics Tim Weiser said. "We have expenses built into our budget to maintain our facilities, but to build new or remodel isn't something you'll find."

Big 12 schools like Texas, Nebraska, Texas A&M and Oklahoma are in a class of their own, Director of Development Ernie Barrett said.

"I hate to use the term 'keeping up with the Joneses,' but that's basically what it amounts to," Barrett said. "We just have to work a little harder at it, but we still get it done."

BRANDEBERRY

"Facilities are a big part to the recruiting process and a big part of competing with the other schools," Hill said. "Obviously, I'm thrilled to come over and be a part of the new facilities."

With the baseball season starting in February, the team mainly uses Brandeberry for indoor practices during bad weather. Because the facility is used by a number of teams, including baseball, track, golf and women's rowing, the building has had a lot of wear and tear.

"We've got insulation that is falling down and we've got lights that don't light up very well. It's just got a bad feel to it," Weiser said. "That's a facility that we talk to our recruits about – our baseball recruits have to see that, and we have events from the general public that are held in there."

Assistant Athletics Director Charlie Thomas said that the contract has been awarded and the project should start soon. Thomas said with the exception of the floor covering, everything will be renovated.

"Brandeberry looks like a war zone," Thomas said. "We are going to put new lighting, new insulation, new doors

NHL | 5 players, coaches inducted into Hall of Fame

Pat LaFontaine was inducted into the Hockey Hall of Fame on Monday after starring for the New York Islanders, Buffalo Sabres and New York Rangers in a career cut short by concussions.

LaFontaine

He entered the shrine with Grant Fuhr, one of his Buffalo teammates and the first black player to enter the hall. Detroit Red Wings owner Mike Ilitch and amateur coach Brian Kilrea joined the hall in the builders' category.

MLB | White Sox hire Guillen

Ozzie Guillen is back with the Chicago White Sox, this time as the team's manager.

The three-time All-Star shortstop was hired Monday to replace Jerry Manuel, who was fired Sept. 29 after the White Sox failed to reach the playoffs for the second straight year.

Guillen

Guillen has no managerial experience and has spent the past two seasons as the third-base coach for the Florida Marlins. But he made it clear how badly he wanted this job, and his passion won over general manager Kenny Williams and owner Jerry Reinsdorf.

MLB | Wagner traded

All-Star closer Billy Wagner was traded Monday from the Houston Astros to the Philadelphia Phillies.

Wagner

Wagner, a three-time All-Star, figures to solidify a bullpen that struggled at times last season as the Phillies fell short of the NL wild card.

With eight games left, Philadelphia was a half-game ahead of Florida, which went on to win the wild card and the World Series.

Big East | Virginia Tech, Miami players suspended

Virginia Tech cornerback DeAngelo Hall and Miami cornerback Andrel Rolle were suspended by the Big East on Monday for fighting during the Okie's 31-7 upset victory over the Hurricanes on Saturday night.

Hall will miss the first half of the fifth-ranked Hokies' game at No. 21 Pittsburgh on Saturday night, and Rolle will miss all of Miami's game against No. 18 Tennessee.

Big 12 | Lawyer says Dotson innocent, alleges coverup

An attorney for the father of Baylor basketball player Patrick Dennehy says his investigation shows that Dennehy was killed by someone other than Carlton Dotson, the former player charged in the crime.

Baylor officials said attorney Daniel Cartwright's statements do not merit a response because they do not include details or named sources. Cartwright declined to reveal the evidence or identify potential suspects.

Cats in 8th after 1st day of tournament

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's golf team is tied for eighth place out of 14 teams in its final tournament of the fall season at the Edwin Watts/Palmetto in Kiawah Island, S.C.

K-State senior Christine Boucher and teammate Karen Quintelier led the Cats, firing a round of 76 and standing in a tie for 17th.

K-State coach Kristi Knight said K-State played well, but there's still work to be done in Tuesday's final 27 holes, as the Cats trail tournament leader Notre Dame by just eight strokes. Just 20 shots separate first place from last place.

"It is just a matter of a few more putts falling," Knight said. "Christine was happy with the way she hit the ball, but she just did not make any putts."

That, Knight said, was the story of the day.

"Nobody got anything going, never got any momentum," Knight said. "Everybody kind of hung around and did the best they could."

K-State junior Sarah Heffel, playing for the team in her first tournament of the season, shot an 82. Knight said Heffel, like Boucher, struggled with her short game.

Despite the struggles at Oak Point Golf Course, Knight said conditions were still manageable.

"The greens are slow for the most part," Knight said. "You have to use the right club so that you do not leave yourself a long putt."

K-State is still within striking distance, only shots behind the leader. Knight said the Cats just need to keep fighting.

"I will remind them they hit a lot of good shots today," Knight said. "They have to expect something good to happen.

"We cannot control what the other teams do. They can only control what is going on between their ears. They have to stay positive and know they are capable of playing well. They have to believe in themselves."

Knight also said Tuesday's final round of the fall season isn't something the team is thinking about.

"I do not think anyone has talked about it, that it is the last round," Knight said. "I know they want to finish this fall on a strong note. It is three months until you get to tee it up again."

Coach raises family amid team's support

By Andi Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Being a parent isn't easy, and when you're the coach of a top-10 volleyball, team it's definitely not easy.

"It's hard sometimes, but I love being a mom, and I love being a volleyball coach, so I want to be able to do both," Coach Suzie Fritz said. "I do have a tremendous support structure in place. My husband is a wonderful man, he helps me a great deal – my entire staff is very supportive of my family. I have lots of help."

Fritz had her first child, T.J., when she was in her third year as assistant coach with K-State, and now as head coach of the No. 7 Wildcats, is expecting her second child at the end of December.

"As an assistant coach, your time is someone else's and so for me, it is certainly not any more difficult," Fritz said. "I can set my own schedule, and I have a lot of help – I have a wonderful staff."

With Fritz's parents living in Clay Center, Kan. and her husband Steve's parents living in Gypsum, Kan., raising her family is a team effort, Fritz said.

"I have lots of help. My parents live very close and my in-laws live very close, so we are kind of raising our family by committee," she said. "There are a lot of people that pitch in and help us when we both have to be out of town, because my husband coaches as well. T.J. is very adaptable. He kind of goes with the flow, but I don't think he has any other choice."

T.J., who will be 3 years old at the end of January, spends time with a team that is very supportive of Fritz's family, she said.

"They're excited about the baby and wonderful with T.J. He's not a little brother, but he's like a little mascot and they take care of him," she said. "He likes to torment them and vice-versa. They're great. They understand my family is important to me."

Legendary sports figure causes headaches for his fans

MATTHEW GIRARD

John Madden is a broadcasting icon.

It's just too bad he is an idiot.

With his "Maddenisms," telestrator and knack for stating the obvious, he has annoyed me ever since I took an interest in football, oh so many years ago.

To some, he is funny and insightful. To me, he can be funny, but in a Forrest Gump type of way.

Case in point – "Winning is a great deodorant. When you win everyone comes around you. When you lose, no one does."

The legendary former player and coach has been associated with the NFL for 45 years and knows his football, so one would think he would be able to give us fans tidbits of information that only a man with his experience would notice.

But not Madden. He takes the obvious and attempts to be philosophical with aspects of the game that a five-year-old could pick out.

He made the telestrator famous. Using a TV screen and his finger, Madden could draw the x's and o's of a play and give the viewer an idea of how a play developed.

But Madden takes it a step further and uses those yellow lines to draw smiley faces, circle fans and to let everyone know how hard the offensive line is working by showing how far down the sweat stains on their backsides have traveled.

The most annoying characteristic of Madden is his "Maddenisms." Made famous by the popular Madden NFL games, phrases such as "Boom," and "Where'd that truck come from?" have forced me to play the best NFL simulation game with the mute button on.

ABC even used his voice from the video game to cover a Bears-Dolphins game last year when the commentator fell ill.

His unique choice of words and face have also been used in several commercials throughout

PILLOW TALK

Size is small aspect of relationship

JAMES HURLA

Sometimes, I'm afraid I'm going to lose her.

My fiancee, Laura, is not going to run away from me – she's barely quick enough to run away from her toddler cousins.

No, I'm afraid I'm going to physically lose her, like she'll fall between the couch cushions or something.

Her claim of 5 feet, 0 inches includes her tennis shoes, and it has caused some pain during our years together.

High school dances were tortuous, as I stooped down a full foot to maintain a conversation or steal a kiss.

Hugs are always a bit awkward, as it looks like she's trying to blow a raspberry on my stomach.

When she cooks, she needs either a step stool or a taller person – this is one of few instances where I prove useful to her – to get items from high shelves.

But dating a quasi-midget has its advantages, too.

TRAVEL

On the few trips we've taken together, it's been much more convenient to stow her in the overhead compartment. It saves money on tickets, and I don't have the guilt of checking her and stuffing her into the cargo bay.

SPORTING EVENTS

In the crowded student section, we generally are the ones to get pushed off the bleacher. But no worry – I can stand behind her and we each can still see the game.

COMFORT

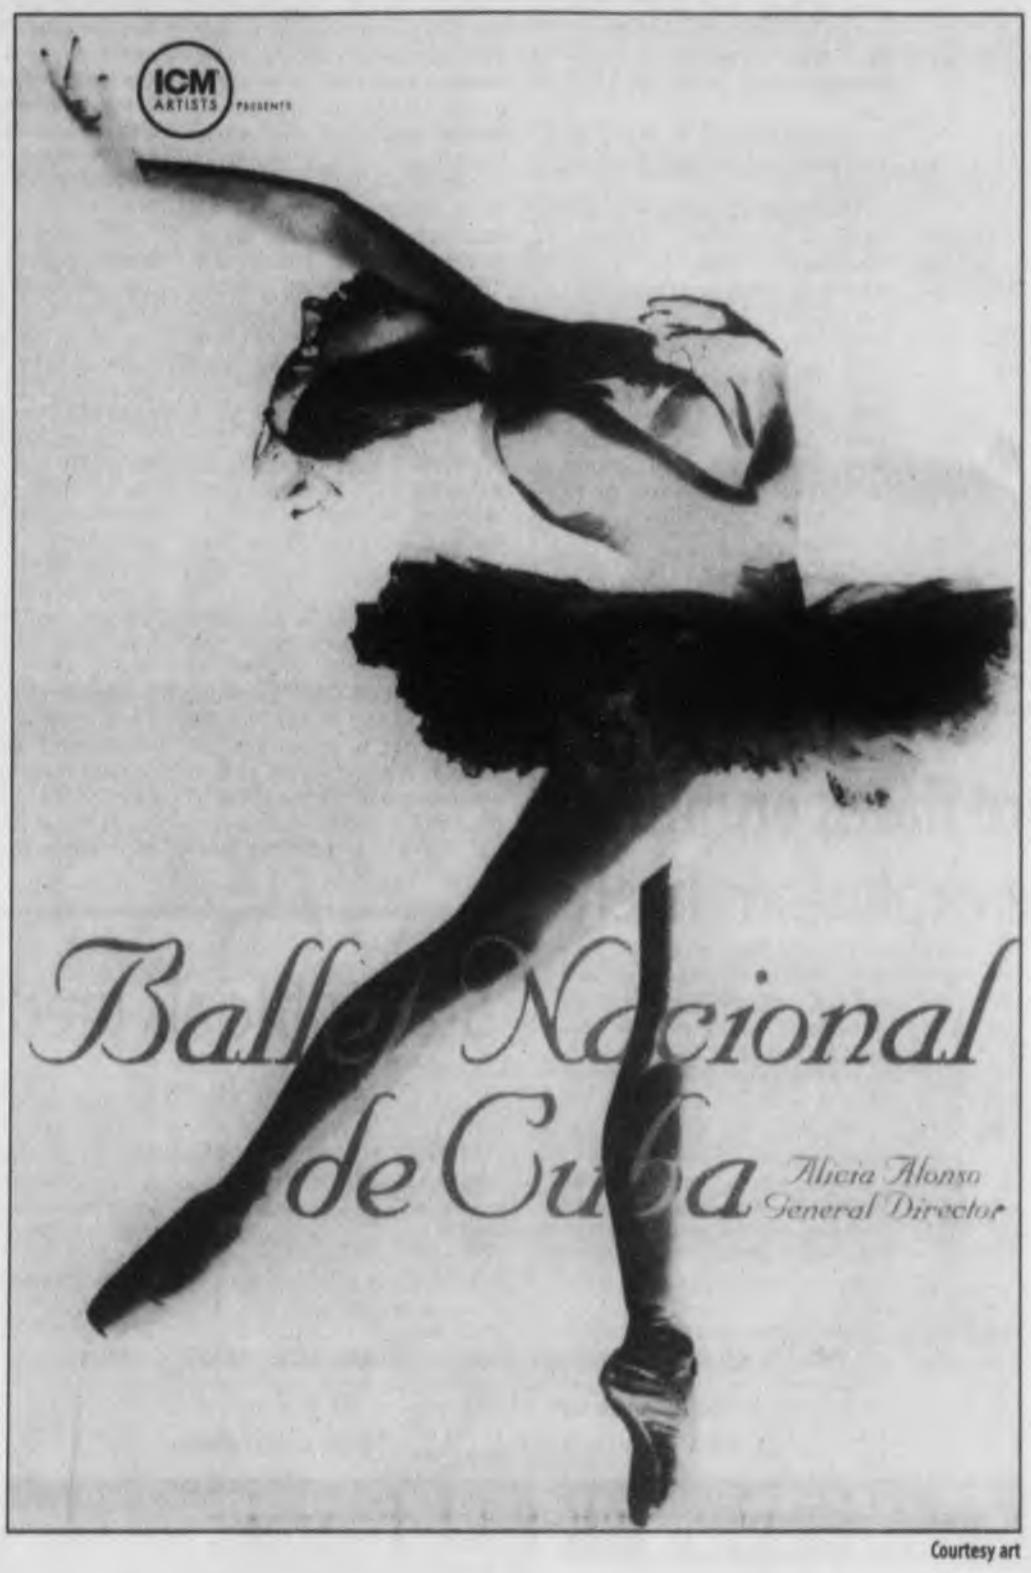
Standing in lines is always more convenient when she's around. Sure, there's conversation and whatnot, but her head is at a near-perfect level for an armrest – yet another reason for my undying love.

THRIFT

At times a little awkward, at others wondrous – she still looks young enough to get child's admission prices to movies and carnivals. Buying clothing for her – despite the obvious, transcending male inability to have a sense of fashion – is cheap. Shoes, dresses, pants and blouses bought in the children's section are almost always cheaper than those bought in the grown-ups' section.

GIFT IDEAS

My-size Barbie still a relevant possibility.



ARGUING

If we're fighting over the remote, the last cookie or my wallet, I just need to hold it above my head and watch her hop up and down hopelessly. It's amusing to me – until she kicks me in the groin to take my wallet.

But then, after this column, I probably deserve it.

Foreign ballet rare opportunity to view classic performances

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The world-renowned National Ballet of Cuba will be pirouetting into McCain Auditorium tonight.

A chance to see a ballet troupe such as the National Ballet of Cuba is a rare occurrence, Joyce Yagerline, associate professor of dance, said.

"It's always a wonderful opportunity for the public to see dance," said Yagerline, director of the K-State dance program. "Not much comes through McCain, because we're sort of off the beaten path. But it's great to see the classics of ballet performed."

She said that in most cases, a performance like this would stop off in major cities, such as Chicago or Kansas City.

Yagerline said this troupe will be performing several different pieces, including "Giselle," "Swan Lake," "Coppelia" and "The Nutcracker." She said she has been excited for this event because she has danced many of the pieces, and that is what she is planning to talk about in her lecture.

"I'm going to talk briefly about the ballets," Yagerline said. "Out of the seven ballets, I've done five. I will talk first hand about what it's like."

David Ollington, assistant professor of dance, said he's excited about the repertoire the dance troupe offers. He said "Giselle" stands out because it's one of the best pieces in ballet.

"They're doing a piece from act two," Ollington said. "It's landmark, one of the best, if not the best. Kansas City did it (Giselle), we're getting an excerpt of it, then we're doing a full length next semester. It's sort of the year for 'Giselle.'

"But it's going to be a very classical concert. We get modern dance more often, and this is a nice change of pace."

Christie Skelton, freshman in dance, said she's excited to see the ballet. She said she regularly goes to see ballet in Kansas City and a chance to see an event of this magnitude in McCain is great.

"I know that they're going to be doing excerpts from a lot of different ballets," Skelton said.

Yagerline said that it is incredible to see a troupe such as this because they make it look so easy.

"I've done it (dance) for most of my life and I love ballet," Yagerline said. "It is so hard and difficult to do it. But with groups like this, they make it look so easy and effortless. Like dancing on your toe – it takes so much concentration and they make it look so easy."

Ollington said he enjoys the arts, especially ballet, and this troupe in particular because of its founder and director, Alicia Alonso.

He said she probably is the most famous ballerina in modern times.

"She's a major figure in ballet," Ollington said.

"She went to New York and danced with really prominent people.

"Then, she went home and brought this culture and art form to her nation, which is notable."

Yagerline said it's a little-known fact that Alonso was blind. She said that's why Alicia Alonso is so inspirational to dancers.

"People should come out and check it out. It's a great opportunity for dance majors, minors, faculty, students, people in the community and even those who don't live in Manhattan."

Epic tales popular

Film franchises like "Lord of the Rings," "The Matrix" and "Kill Bill" are dabbling in installment plans, taking their cue from a serial format, dating back to the ancient Greeks.

"Certainly, serialization of entertainment started with literature," said Keanu Reeves, who stars as Neo in "The Matrix" trilogy, which concludes with "The Matrix Revolutions," debuting Wednesday.

Moore matures musically

The idea of Mandy Moore covering the songs of Joni Mitchell and Carole King might seem as unlikely as Britney Spears doing an album of Bob Dylan classics.

After all, this is the Mandy Moore who started out four years ago as a Britney-clone with the saccharine hit "Candy."

Moore

Ferrell returns to screen

Will Ferrell didn't know whether to expect success or failure when he made the switch from TV to the big screen.

He turned out to be a knockout in last spring's "Old School" and is hoping for another box office hit with "Elf," opening nationwide Friday.

Ferrell

Undetected STD can cause cancer

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Eighty percent of sexually active people under age 25 have a form of human papilloma virus.

It's the most common and fastest growing sexually-transmitted disease that cannot be identified with a test.

The National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases reports there are 5.5 million new cases of the STD each year and at least 20 million Americans already have been infected.

Genital warts, part of the HPV family, is becoming a more prevalent problem among college-aged Americans.

"It's the most common in the U.S.," said Wendy Blank, gynecologist at Lafene Health Center.

"Most trends probably transfer to here."

There are more than 100 types of HPV; however, only 30 types are spread through sexual contact. HPV is the same virus that causes warts.

Genital warts are identified by a bump on the outside of the vagina or penis that does not go away.

The warts, though, can be on the inside of the vagina, making the disease virtually undetectable.

Although the actual genital wart is not dangerous, the virus can become cancerous if not treated through a natural immune system process, Blank said.

"A small percentage of people that get high-risk HPV will have them persist," she said.

"They can end up with cervical cancer."

However, the good news is that 20 percent of cases of the virus are resolved over the course of the year without treatment.

Warts vary in texture and size, although most people with HPV do not have the warts.

They are very contagious and are spread through oral, genital or anal sex, according to the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases.

About two-thirds of people who have sexual contact with a partner infected with genital warts will develop warts within three months of contact.

"The longer they are ignored, the bigger they get," Blank said.

If detected, treatment options include various creams or acid solutions that are applied to the infected area, freezing the wart off with liquid nitrogen and surgical removal.

Routine pap smears do not usually identify the virus until it develops into pre-cancer or cervical cancer.

"If the pap smears are abnormal, they may need another test, maybe a biopsy," Blank said. "It's important to know the pap smear is not an HPV test."

Researches are working on vaccines, the national institute reports.

One type of vaccine would be used to prevent infection or disease and the other would be used to treat cervical cancers. Both vaccines are currently being tested in human trials.

For now, though, the only way to prevent yourself and your partner from getting HPV, Blank said, is to abstain from sexual intercourse or to have been each other's only partners.

"It's one that's hard to prevent," Blank said. "Condoms can only decrease transmission."

Public forum to educate citizens about Patriot Act

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan and Riley County residents will have the chance tonight to speak about the United States Patriot Act.

Geri Simon, president of the League of Women Voters, said the organization is sponsoring a public forum at 7 p.m. to discuss the advantages and disadvantages of the recent legislation.

"We would like the citizens to be able to learn about the Patriot Act and what it means to civil liberties," Simon said. "This is a chance to educate the public with two speakers who we feel know a lot about the issues and decide what they think."

The forum will be in a pro/con format, she said.

"We will have United States Attorney Eric Mellgren coming from Wichita as the pro speaker, and Dick Kurtenbach will be the con speaker," she said.

Kurtenbach is the executive director of the Kansas and Western Missouri chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union. He said he believes the Patriot Act is important because it is a significant part of our government's response to the 2001 terrorist attacks.

"The ACLU believes there was a problem in the process that produced this legislation," he said. "It was passed in the climate in the immediate aftermath of 9/11 without enough discussion on the part of congress and our government."

The organization, Kurtenbach said, believes the act goes too far in restricting the civil liberties of American citizens and others.

John Fliter, associate professor of political science at K-State, will be providing a brief description of what the Patriot Act entails. He said he is excited about this opportunity for public dialogue.

"Forums like this are important because we need to have this kind of public dialogue about the balancing of civil rights in a time of war and international terrorism," he said.

Fliter said he believes the forum is important to inform people of what the government is doing.

"In a time of war there is a tendency to diminish rights, and we have to be careful that we don't go too far," he said. "I think the format of this forum is going to do a good job in examining the issue."

Following Fliter's introduction, Simon said each speaker will have 15 minutes to present their side of the story, and then each will have a 10-minute rebuttal opportunity.

"There will be a 30-minute question-and-answer period afterwards," she said.

Simon said she is happy the organization is able to provide such a good lineup.

"Its not every day that we get two speakers of this caliber – especially the U.S. Attorney," she said.

The league is a civic and political organization interested in educating its citizens on government issues, Simon said.

However, the league does not have a specific position regarding the Patriot Act.

"We are concerned about civil liberties in these times of special considerations," she said.

Scientists record 3 more flares erupting from sun; more surface explosions likely

By Joseph B. Verrengia
ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

BOULDER, Colo. – The Sun fired at least three more salvos of highly charged particles toward Earth Sunday and Monday, and scientists said more explosions from the Sun's surface were likely.

The latest solar eruptions brought to six the number of huge flares noted since last Wednesday, one of the most turbulent periods in solar observations since 1940.

The sunspots that have been generating the flares probably will rotate out of view in the next day or so, according to scientists.

That would offer Earth a respite from the eruptions and the geomagnetic storms they trigger in the atmosphere, according to the Space Environment Center at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration here.

The outbursts pose no direct danger to people on Earth's surface, but satellite operators have been forced to take preventive measures to limit damage from the incoming particles.

No problems have been reported in the United States.

Last week two Japanese satellites were damaged and Sweden experienced a blackout, while airline communications on northern routes were disrupted.

The speedy particles colliding with the upper atmosphere could generate colorful aurora displays in the night sky as far south as Colorado.

State officials predict steady revenues

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – Officials predicted Monday that state revenues will remain flat into 2005.

Those officials issued a new, slightly more optimistic economic forecast for the 2004 fiscal year, which began July 1, increasing the official estimate for total general revenues by about $12 million, to $4.48 billion, a change of 0.3 percent.

That figure includes $91.4 million in relief the state has received from the federal government under legislation approved by Congress earlier this year.

The estimators also released the first official forecast for the 2005 fiscal year, predicting about $14 million less, or $4.47 billion, in general revenues.

They said the estimate was lower for fiscal year 2005 because the federal relief will not come again.

The difference between the projected revenues for fiscal year 2004 and fiscal year 2005 is about 0.3 percent.

Making the estimates were Department of Revenue officials, members of Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' budget staff, legislative researchers and university economists.

Officials warn motorists to be cautious of deer

Deer collisions reach yearly high on Deer D-Day

By Amy Lundine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There will be cars damaged, deer killed and people injured – and only so much can be done by the public to avoid this annual high number of collisions.

Traffic safety managers at the Kansas Department of Transportation have named Nov. 17 Deer D-Day because it is the peak day for deer/motor vehicle collisions on Kansas roads and highways.

"Over about the last decade, we've had approximately 700 deer/vehicle collisions on Nov. 17," said Krista Roberts, public information officer at the Kansas Department of Transportation.

According to the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks in Pratt, the collisions occur more often in the fall because deer are usually more active during the mating, or rut, season, occurring from late October to mid-December.

According to accident records, deer accidents caused 341 injuries and one fatality last year. In 1999, there was an all-time high of 10,201 deer hit by cars, injuring 444 people.

In 2002, the number of deer/vehicle collisions dropped to a five-year low of 9,287, and officials predict this number will remain similar in 2003.

Lloyd Fox, big-game program coordinator for the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks, said the decision in 1998 to increase the number of permits to hunt deer without antlers reduced the number of female deer and decreased herd numbers.

However, it is becoming more difficult to keep the deer numbers low. The space available for hunters in Kansas is becoming smaller, and there was a decrease in the number of permits given in 2002.

Roberts said there are several ways drivers can be more cautious in order to avoid collisions with deer.

Drivers should be aware of wooded areas, golf courses, parks, water sources and other places where deer would like to be, Roberts said. They also should know deer usually travel in groups, so when one is seen, others usually will follow.

Roberts said it is a good idea to use high-beam headlights at night whenever possible, because the eyes of the deer reflect in the light, making them more visible.

Roberts also advised motorists to avoid swerving to miss deer, because losing control of the car is potentially more dangerous to the driver than hitting the deer.

"The reality is that deer have both positive and negative values," Fox said. "Yes, they're a hazard on our highways, but they're one of the most popular wildlife species."

Afghanistan drafts constitution

Document stresses unity, Islamic principles

By Burt Herman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KABUL, Afghanistan – Two years after the fall of the Taliban, the Afghan government unveiled a historic draft constitution Monday, aiming to cast aside a quarter-century of conflict with a unified Islamic state under a powerful presidency.

The draft makes Afghanistan an Islamic republic but stops short of imposing the harsh brand of Islamic law favored by the Taliban, and for the first time enshrines a permanent role for women in governing the country.

Still, turning the document's guarantees of equality, liberty, dignity and free speech into reality in a country lacking all of them will be a singular challenge for President Hamid Karzai and future Afghan leaders.

The draft, containing 160 articles in 12 chapters, is to be presented next month for approval at a constitutional loya jirga, or grand council, of some 500 delegates from across the country.

The document was the result of a year's work – and months of delay – reflecting deep divisions and fierce back-room struggles inside the 35-member Constitutional Review Commission.

The most dramatic change from earlier drafts was the elimination of the post of prime minister and concentration of power in the president – who will be commander in chief of the military, have the power to appoint one-third of the parliament's upper house, and to name judges, military officers, police and national security officials.

Extending that centralized power to Afghan's provinces and patchwork of regional allegiances and ethnic groups – where warlords rule like feudal princes in areas that seem frozen in time – will be the constitution's true test.

"The degree of centralizing that you see here is for the time being simply wishful thinking, unless there's going to be a change of the balance of power between the center and the provinces," said Vikram Parekh, senior analyst on Afghanistan for the International Crisis Group think tank.

"Frankly, I don't see in the near term how that's going to be implementable."

The draft's first article declares "Afghanistan is an Islamic Republic," an indication of the government's desire to bring the country together under the banner of Islam, practiced by almost all Afghans.

"The religion of Afghanistan is the sacred religion of Islam. Followers of other religions are free to perform their religious ceremonies within the limits of the provisions of law," the draft states, according to an English translation provided by the government.

At a ceremony at the Presidential Palace, red-bound copies of the draft constitution were handed to former King Mohammad Zaher Shah, President Karzai and Lakhdar Brahimi, special envoy of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

"I hope this will be acceptable for the people and will direct people toward peace, security and democracy," said the 88-year-old Zaher Shah.

The constitution accords for the former king the ceremonial title of "Father of the Nation." But it has no provisions for the monarchy to continue after his death.

CROHN'S | Disease forces adaption to new food, schedules; condition causes medical concerns with nutrition helped a student with a sleep disorder to take afternoon classes."

The Americans with Disabilities Act wants universities to work on a case-by-case basis, Holden said.

"A student can come in and we can talk and figure out what would be useful for them," she said. "We encourage students to let teachers know and encourage a flexible attendance policy, if it's feasible."

Disability support services has helped students with Crohn's disease before, Holden said.

"We have written letters to ask instructors to help students to be seated by a door so that if they need to leave, they could do so easily," she said.

Mueller said she had a lot of problems adjusting when she started college.

"When I came to K-State, I had a lot of problems with the Derb food," she said. "I'm not used to eating all that fatty food that's not good for me. It took a lot of getting used to."

Mueller said her diet is restricted by her disease.

"I can't eat any uncooked vegetables, any fruit that has a lot of acid in it or fatty foods," she said. "I have to be careful with anything with spice in it, no matter what it is. A lot of Chinese food and Mexican food, I can't eat at all. Some dairy products are OK, and some I can't have."

Her immune system is affected, also, Mueller said.

"When I get sick, I get really sick because my immune system is not that of a normal person's," she said. "I'm always fighting the disease. It's always going on – my blood cells are always fighting that, so when I get sick, it's like I have two battles going on in my body."

Mueller has notified her teachers about her disease.

"Most of them know about it," she said. "A lot of them don't know what it is, so they don't know what to expect. I told them it won't be an everyday occurrence, but there might be times where I just can't make it to class, and to give me a little leeway.

Mueller found out she had Crohn's during her sophomore year of high school.

"When I first got diagnosed, I was really kind of embarrassed, because intestines are not something you want to talk about with people," she said. "I didn't tell anybody what was really going on except for a few of my best friends, and for a while there, I kept it so quiet that no one had any idea what was going on. Now I've just gotten used to it."

Mueller said she missed her sophomore year of high school because she was being diagnosed.

"I was sick a lot," she said. "My friends thought I was anorexic because I didn't eat as much as I used to, because every time I ate I felt sick, and would usually end up throwing it up. But that wasn't the case – I love food, and I tried to eat all the time."

After a while, Mueller's friends expressed their concerns to her parents, who took her to the doctor, who thought she had the stomach flu.

"When I get sick, I get really sick because my immune system is not that of a normal person's. I'm always fighting the disease."

Cheryl Mueller
FRESHMAN IN ELEMENTARY EDUCATION

"That went on and on – I went through more and more testing, and they finally figured out it was Crohn's. By that time, I had lost, like, 30 pounds."

All of this time, Mueller was missing more and more school.

"My sophomore year of high school, I averaged 16 days of school one semester," she said. "I was at home, and I couldn't get up, or I had blood tests or other tests, or I was on a liquid diet."

When she did make it to school, she was in a daze, Mueller said.

"I would have times where I was so out of it, I would walk into the wrong classroom and just stand there looking around and have no idea what was going on," she said. "I don't remember any classes I took. The only thing that kept me in school was that I was on the honor roll. I studied in all my free-time that I could at my house."

The medicine also was a problem, Mueller said.

"Once I got diagnosed it wasn't over and done with," she said. "I still had to get it under control. I had to take so many steroids that my eyes would get inflamed. I couldn't even close my eyes one night, so I had to stay up all night because it was so painful. My joints swelled up to bigger than softball size and filled with liquid, and they are still messed up."

Mueller enjoys playing sports – she plays flag football on an intramural team.

"For a while I had to stop playing sports because it got so bad," she said. "All the medicine I take messed up my joints, so I have to be careful."

Mueller said, in addition to the anti-inflammatory medicine she takes for the disease, she also takes vitamins and minerals.

"Because I can't eat certain things, I'm missing out on a lot of vitamins and minerals," she said.

Mueller said her doctors told her not to drink alcohol.

"The medicine I take is really bad for my liver," she said. "They say don't do it, but if I do, to drink small amounts."

Mueller said the disease will affect her for the rest of her life.

"It could affect having children," she said. "It could prevent the child from getting nutrients. Also, it's not proven yet, but there's a chance I could give it to my kids, so there is some genetic link. It will probably shorten my life, also."

Because she has a chronic illness, Mueller said she has to stay positive.

"By seeing that other people have it, it helps me," she said. "Most days I'm normal, but if I have a bad week, I have a really bad week. I just don't dwell on it."

FAMILY | Fritz may be in labor while team is playing

Despite being seven months pregnant, Fritz said the situation isn't limiting.

"I don't hit a lot of balls in practice, but I never have," Fritz said. "I don't play in practice, but I never have. I talk a lot, I yell a little, and I coach.

"It's not a limiting factor except that fatigue becomes a factor in late pregnancy, so I get kind of tired some days. I'm a very fortunate person in that I'm one of those women that feels pretty good during pregnancy."

Outside hitter Cari Jensen, who was on the team when Fritz was pregnant the first time, said she handles her family life well.

"It's got to be a very, very tough role with all the traveling she does and the time commitment of being a head coach, let alone at a level like this. She balances it really well," Jensen said. "It's got to be a tough job, not being able to be with your kid very much and being away so much."

Fritz's husband, Steve, who is an assistant coach for the track team, said he and his wife feel like they have a lot of children with their own and the athletes they coach.

"It is like your athletes are your kids, and then you have your kids at home and your family, and it just makes an extended family that you can draw support from if you need to," Steve said.

"Not all coaches may view it that way, but in our household, phones always open, doors always open, so we get calls all the time. That's fine and that's how Suzie and I both view coaching. It works well for us, but at times it can make hectic situations."

With the volleyball team having won 22 of their last 23 matches, the Wildcats have a good chance of making it farther in the NCAA tournament than before, which will be cutting it close for Suzie's new addition.

"Dec. 30 is supposedly the due day," Steve said, "so if they make it really far in the tournament, it's going to be within a week or so."

everything will be renovated."

Hill said the project will make things a lot safer for his team to practice.

"Lighting is a major issue over there, and it's just hard to see," he said. "If you want to play catch and you're seeing shadows, it's really kind of dangerous. There'll be three cages, and then the lighting will make it so much nicer, and we will be able to go in and not worry about dodging shadows."

BOATHOUSE

A $1.1 million project is underway for a new boathouse at Tuttle Creek Reservoir to house the women's rowing team.

The boathouse itself will be added on to part of the existing structure, and will have state-of-the-art facilities, including a weight room.

A new road leading to the water's edge has been added, and the stairway from the boathouse to the water has been replaced.

"Now we've got some accessibility for a person that might be mobility impaired," Thomas said.

"If we have an emergency situation, we have means to get an ambulance down to the water."

The project broke ground in the spring and is expected to be complete by April 1, 2004.

R.V. CHRISTIAN TRACK COMPLEX

R.V. Christian Track Complex had a $1.446 million renovation completed in May, and the facility now includes an eight-lane track, multiple-use field events areas, a jogging lane and an incline/decline training lane.

Although the facility was renovated, the men's team is still using the public locker room at Ahearn Field House, and the women have a small locker room that Thomas said was "nothing to write home about."

Fundraising is under way to add a building containing showers, locker rooms, storage and coach offices at the north end of the track.

"We've got one gift that, I guess we'd be at the 50-yard line with this, and if we could get the other gift, we are at a position where we could start the plan and maybe even break the ground before the snow flies," Weiser said. "But if we don't hear for a while, then we are going to in a holding pattern here."

the years. Ads for Tinactin, Ace Hardware and Outback Steakhouse, just to name a few, get more annoying every time I see them.

I hate the way he refers to "today's player." He never has a good thing to say about players who show a little emotion on the field, and "if I were his coach, that wouldn't happen."

Sorry, John, today's players are completely different from the ones you coached in the 1970s, and all of today's players learned from those you coached.

But nonetheless, I sit down in front of the TV, crack a cold one and wait to hear what John will try to enlighten me with next, hoping I get the chance to hear Madden say something like, "of course, if he had had control of the ball when he hit the ground, then it would have been a complete pass."

FUNDING | Representatives from Kansas colleges to discuss state funding strategies for higher education president, said.

"They talked about themselves and their vision for the upcoming sessions," she said.

Kerns said the university already has a strong relationship with the representatives but hopes the forum strengthened that bond.

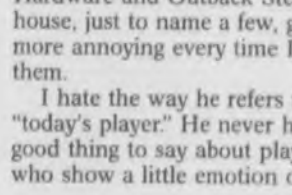
"More than anything, it opened that door and provided opportunities for the future," she said.

At Fort Hays State, there will be a press conference concerning higher-education Thursday morning with Student Body President Mitchell Hall, along with university administrators.

"It will focus on the importance of higher-education in Kansas," Hall said. "We should have good press coverage from here in western Kansas."

Thursday evening at the regularly scheduled Student Senate meeting, senators will write letters to their representatives.

Also, Rep. Eber Phelps, D-Hays, will present higher-education funding strategies from a legislative standpoint.



"He will speak about the outlook for students and how it looks," Hall said.

Hall said that with all regents institutions voicing their opinions, he expects legislators will listen.

"There is power in numbers. The more we collaborate and work together, the better off we are," he said.

Knopp said he was more skeptical, but that the rallies and letter-writing campaigns are a step in the right direction.

"It's hard to know how to get through to the Legislature," he said. "It's a good start, and I hope they will be listening."

Missouri adopts 'common hour' for speakers

K-State unlikely to change policy

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's called common hour.

The University of Missouri-Columbia started it, and its purpose is to allow students time to attend speeches and participate in discussions.

An hour will be set aside one day each week that no one will have class.

K-State won't adopt a similar program, Chuck Reagan, chair of the Landon Lecture Series and associate to the president, said.

Reagan said growing interest in speakers and scheduling difficulties will prevent a similar program.

"At Paul Harvey, we had an overflow crowd," Reagan said. "We've already looked into changing the Tuesday and Thursday schedules so our 10:30 a.m. speeches won't overlap two class times."

Reagan said the recruited speakers are popular enough that coordinators of lectures wouldn't be able to set aside a specific hour each week for a day.

"We have got to take these speakers when we can get them," Reagan said. "The caliber of people we get is tough to work schedules around."

Elizabeth Dodd, faculty senator of the College of Arts and Sciences and professor of English, said many departments on campus mentioned a desire to keep time in the afternoons free for speakers and other meetings.

"The Faculty Senate just approved and is now reconsidering major changes to the standard class schedule," Dodd said.

Dodd said a diverse campus setting makes a program such as the common hour difficult to initiate.

"Many of the parties on campus don't find it convincing to find a standard for the class times," Dodd said.

Students write to legislators asking for money to help end tuition increases

By Lacey Storer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dressed in coats, gloves and scarves, about 40 students braved the cold weather Tuesday night in a rally for higher education.

The group carried signs reading phrases like "Support higher education" and "Stop budget cuts." They rallied for support from governors and legislators for more money for institutions like K-State.

"We've got some problems that need to be addressed," said Seth Bridge, chair of the Governmental Relations Committee. "That's what we're here for tonight."

The students were participating in Pack the Library, a letter-writing campaign designed to bring awareness to students and politicians about the need for more funding.

The event began at 7 p.m. with a picket line in front of Hale library, moving every so often to Anderson Hall and back.

At 7:45, more students joined in for the letter writing and the free pizza and pop. The event concluded with speakers such as Rep. Roger Reitz, R-Manhattan, and Sen. Steve Morris, R-Kan.

While last year's Pack the Library focused on keeping the library's hours, this year's event focused on getting more money for higher education and stopping cuts in the education budget.

Though some students attended because they were required for a class, most were there in support of the cause. The importance of the issue drew students in all phases of their college careers to show their support and let their voices be heard.

- Cuts in funding for higher education hurt the Kansas economy. For every $1 put into higher education, the state receives an estimated $7 in return.
- Last year alone saw K-State lose $12 million of its purchasing power.
- Cuts to higher education mean larger class sizes, a reduction in the number of classes offered, unfilled faculty positions and students who are unable to attend K-State because they can't afford it.
- One example of the effect of tuition increase: engineering students who entered K-State three years ago are paying 80 percent more than when they started.

Commission sells $3 million bond

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Twice a year, Manhattan sells bonds to cover outstanding temporary notes.

Last night the City Commission approved George K. Baum's bid to purchase almost $3 million in general obligation bonds with 3.96 percent interest.

The bonds will cover 12 special assessment projects.

The commission also approved the first reading to authorize city officers to issue notices to appear in municipal court.

After much discussion on the specifics of who would receive the new authority, William Frost, city attorney, informed the commissioners that the first reading does not need to have approval. He said specifics would be worked out at the second reading where the item is officially approved or dismissed.

Diane Stoddard, assistant city manager, informed the city commissioners that by giving authority to city officers the same checks and balances would be in place.

"This approach would help us

Schools ban rate-professor sites

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For decades, students at high schools and universities everywhere have been rating their professors, instructors and teachers through word of mouth. These days, there is a much more formal method – the Internet.

Michael Hussey, co-founder of www.ratemyteachers.com, a site dedicated to high school and even middle school teachers, and its college equivalent, www.ratemyprofessors.com, said he is dedicated to establishing his Web site as an educational resource.

However, many school districts, he said, have deemed it to be a non-educational distraction and banned on-campus access to the sites.

"A common reason administrators give it may be considered a distraction or it is not a resource for education," Hussey said. "On the contrary, a lot of teachers use the Web site in their own classroom to improve their approach."

Hussey said that while organizations like the Student Press Law Center in Arlington, Va., have taken up their cause, he does not foresee any imminent legal action.

"We haven't taken it to court yet," he said. "We don't want to be perceived as an adversary to education, we'd rather

Wildfires
Firefighters contained the biggest and deadliest of Southern California's wildfires Tuesday and turned their attention to mopping up other blazes and heading off mudslides when the rains come. San Diego County's 280,000-acre Cedar Fire was fully surrounded after cool weather and on-and-off rain.

Pilot awake
In the two minutes before a Staten Island ferry slammed into a concrete pier, the pilot stood erect behind the controls and never slumped forward, according to the lone nearby crew member. The ship's captain was not in his required position in the wheelhouse to assist pilot Richard Smith as the ferry attempted to dock on Staten Island.

Stocks settle
Wall Street edged lower Tuesday as investors sought profits from the previous day's session, taking a pause between key economic reports while the earnings season winds down. The drop followed several days of consistent gains.

STUDENT EVISCERATED BY LEAFY VORTEX

Darren Froman, sophomore in computer science, was killed last week when a furious miniature vortex stirred up thousands of leaves, which subsequently sliced him to pieces.

Froman's grieving parents have already filed a class-action lawsuit against K-State's Department of Facilities, alleging the grounds crew, despite endlessly sucking up leaves, has not done enough to control dendrological tempests on campus.

Froman's girlfriend, Clare Vankirk, junior in philosophy, tearfully mused that Froman's exit was appropriate.

"He was so into computers," she said. "He absolutely hated the outdoors, so it's not surprising that the outdoors did him in."

LOCAL RESIDENT TRIES TO RECYCLE CHILDREN

Lois Lippman, 81, was arrested by Riley County police after she knocked out her two sons, both K-State graduates living in Manhattan, bound them and attempted to recycle them at Howie's Recycling.

A horrified employee quickly notified authorities, who soon arrived on the scene and freed the two men.

According to one police officer, who asked not to be named, Lippman, who wears strong corrective lenses, misread a letter to the editor in yesterday's Collegian.

Apparently, in every instance where aluminum recycling was urged, Lippman thought the letter was instead asking residents to recycle alumni.

LIMBAUGH IN TROUBLE FOR RACIST COMMENTS

Rush Limbaugh has been forced to resign from a drug rehab center's newsletter staff after making another racist comment, this time in print.

In a column discussing the staff of an adjacent federal prison, Limbaugh wrote, "The prisoners make such a big deal out of Senior Guard LaMarcus Hayes just because he's black. It has nothing to do with the fearsome tattoos or the frightening physique."

Editor's note: The following passage, unlike everything that has ever before appeared in this section, is genuine. Sometimes the real world satirizes itself.

The New York Times also looks at how Iraqis are trying to get revenge for the horrors committed by Saddam's regime. "If I catch Saddam I won't kill him," said one man, whose teenage sister disappeared. "I'll suck his blood. And if he escapes I'll follow him to the ends of the earth." Two hundred sixty-two mass graves have been found. Yet the Times says there has been "no orgy of bloodshed..."

CBS cancels Reagan miniseries amid outcry from conservatives; Showtime to air project

By David Bauder
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK – Capping an extraordinary conservative furor over a movie virtually no one has seen, CBS said Tuesday it will not air "The Reagans" and shunt it off to the Showtime cable network instead.

Based on snippets of the script that had leaked out in recent weeks, conservatives, including the son of the former president, accused CBS of distorting the legacy of Ronald Reagan.

While CBS said it was not bowing to political pressure, critics said that was exactly the case, and worried about the effects of such pre-emptive strikes on future work.

CBS believed it had ordered a love story about Ronald and Nancy Reagan with politics as a backdrop, but instead got a film that crossed the line into advocacy, said a network executive who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

The film had been scheduled to air Nov. 16 and 18, in the heart of the November ratings sweeps. CBS attempted to edit the film to remove offending passages, but gave up.

"We believe it does not present a balanced portrayal of the Reagans for CBS and its audience," the network said in a statement Tuesday.

Neal Gabler, author of "Life the Movie: How Entertainment Conquered Reality," said CBS' decision was unhealthy for democracy.

"CBS, in pulling this film, did incredible harm, much more harm than they could ever have done in making the film," Gabler said. "What they've told us now is that a very small group of people have censorship power over the broadcast networks."

Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said CBS' decision "smells of intimidation to me."

Cliff Lipson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

"This was a left-wing smear of one of the nation's most beloved presidents and CBS got caught," said Brent Bozell, founder of the Media Research Center.

Without changes, Showtime should remind viewers every 10 minutes that the movie is fictional, he said.

UPC to offer discount movie tickets for Carmike Cinema in coming weeks

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The days of not being able to afford a night out at the movies are over.

Union Program Council will begin selling discount tickets to anyone with a K-State ID for Carmike Cinema within the next few weeks. Instead of paying $7 at the door, students can buy tickets for $5 in the UPC office, which can be used at any movie and time.

"They are good for any movie," Laura Osteen, UPC director, said. "A student can come here and buy 10 tickets and use them any time they want. They are going to be sold in the UPC office, third floor of the Union, to anyone with a K-State ID. That would include faculty, staff and students."

Osteen said there are a few exceptions to use of the discounted tickets, which will be explained to students at the time of purchase.

"There will be rare occasions when they aren't going to be used, but the theater will let everyone know," she said.

No profit is made as UPC also buys the tickets for $5. Cash, check, credit and debit will be accepted forms of payment.

Not only will students benefit from the program but UPC hopes to bring more traffic to the K-State Student Union third floor.

"We think it will be a way to drive traffic through the third floor," UPC President Matt Pruett said.

"Often, you tell them to go to the third floor and they have to ask where it is. It will be our trail of bread crumbs. It will be our chance to hand them a flier. It will really increase awareness about UPC."

The American Automobile Association, a travel assistance agency, sells the discounted tickets to its members in Manhattan. Kim Peterson, auto travel counselor, said the company sells 1,500 to 2,000 tickets a month.

"This month it hasn't been very busy. We haven't sold as many as we usually do," Peterson said. "When there is a lot of fun flicks or it gets near Christmas, we sell more."

There is no profit for the agency selling tickets.

"It is simply a service, and there is not one dime made on them," Peterson said.

Pruett said like AAA, UPC is just trying to provide a valuable service.

"I think it is good because we see with our weekend shows that movies are accessible to every student at K-State," he said.

"It's not an age-intensive activity like some of the other activities. It's something everybody gets into and enjoys."

FCC gives nod to anti-piracy software to help end sharing TV shows online

By Jonthan Salant
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – The government Tuesday approved an anti-piracy mechanism that will make it harder for computer users to illegally distribute digital TV programs on the Internet. The goal is to speed the transition to higher quality digital broadcasts and ensure such programming remains free.

Broadcasters and the movie industry had urged the Federal Communications Commission to take such action, while consumer groups said it will force some people to purchase new electronics.

Some people already share TV shows and movies online, though the practice is limited by the speed of Internet connections _ it can take many hours to transfer high-quality copies.

But as Internet connections get faster and broadcasters switch to much clearer digital television, the movie and television industries fear consumers will put high-quality copies of shows and films on the Web that others can download for free. This would reduce the broadcasters' ability to sell the shows for syndication or overseas.

The music industry saw CD sales fall as free music sharing proliferated on the Internet. It has started to sue listeners who illegally distribute songs online.

The five-member FCC voted unanimously to allow a "broadcast flag" to be added to digital programming to block broader distribution on the Internet, though the two Democrats on the panel expressed some reservations. Republican FCC Chairman Michael Powell called it "an important step toward preserving the viability of free over-the-air television."

In its order, the FCC told makers of digital television receivers that by July 1, 2005, their models must recognize the flag, an electronic signal that broadcasters can embed in their programs.

The commission said the order applies only to electronics equipment that can receive digital broadcast signals, not digital VCRs, DVD players and personal computers without digital tuners.

"The FCC scored a big victory for consumers and the preservation of high-value, over-the-air free broadcasting with its decision," said Jack Valenti, president of the Motion Picture Association of America.

Viacom, parent company of the CBS television network, called the decision a "historic step forward for consumers."

Consumer and advocacy groups reacted just as strongly against the decision.

TO THE POINT

Class-free hour would benefit students, faculty

Having a common hour during which there are no classes could prove beneficial for K-State students.

Students and administrators could take advantage of the time to schedule major lectures and other universitywide events without forcing students to skip or miss class to attend.

In the very least, it is up to Student Senate to give the matter attention and address it as a viable possibility.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

As the body that is supposed to be representative of the student body, Senate should explore the pros and cons of having a common hour.

The time slot would provide a service primarily to students, and initial discussions of the possibility must therefore come from students.

A common hour would allow for more students to attend major events because they would not be hindered by required class periods during that time.

Therefore, the university would be able to attract even more big-name speakers to campus once the speakers realize the audience is likely to be larger.

Senate has done much to represent students in the past, and this is an issue that requires their attention.

No matter whether Senate decides to pursue the common hour past exploratory discussion is up to the Senate – but the student body deserves it.

Supreme Court battle

Common sense should govern court system

Three men driving through a high-crime area were pulled over at 3:16 a.m.

Officer Jeffrey Snyder pulled the car over for speeding and the driver's failure to wear a seat belt. Snyder asked driver Donte Partlow for his license and registration and noticed a large wad of cash on the glove compartment.

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

Snyder obtained permission to search the car from Partlow. According to the Maryland v. Pringle court document on the Department of Justice Web site, Snyder retrieved five baggies of crack cocaine and $763 in cash from the car. Snyder then questioned the three men separately.

When no one confessed, Snyder arrested all three.

At the police station, passenger Joseph Pringle confessed that the drugs were his to trade for sex at a party. Pringle later changed his mind about the confession and claimed the arrest violated his Fourth Amendment rights.

The Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution provides, "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause..."

The Maryland Court of Appeals struck down the confession, saying the officer had no evidence Pringle exercised control over the cocaine. The cocaine had been hidden between the back-seat armrest and the back seat, within reach of Pringle, who sat in the passenger-side seat.

Now the esteemed Supreme Court is host to a sideshow that includes the American Civil Liberties Union and the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation as third parties arguing probable cause and Fourth Amendment rights.

Unfortunately, common sense and interpretation of the law are not on the menu for these court hearings.

Court Jester No. 1, Gary E. Bair, argued the state has probable cause to arrest everyone in a vehicle containing drugs because it always should be presumed they know about the drugs.

Court Jester No. 2, Justice Sandara Day O'Connor, asked Bair what would be done if an innocent mother was hitching a ride from a druggie son. Would we arrest Mommy?

As the justices' and prosecutors' scenarios continued down the path of ridiculousness, the obvious was subsequently ignored.

Were Pringle's Fourth Amendment rights violated?

Absolutely not.

The ACLU argued the Fourth Amendment requires individualized suspicion, while the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation countered that it was appropriate to arrest multiple suspects and use further investigation to solve the crime.

Police are required to use common sense to determine probable cause. Our legal system should also adopt this use of common sense when interpreting laws to prosecute individuals arrested using determination of probable cause.

The ACLU's and justice system's passion for individual rights and roles as watchdogs of the Constitution are to be commended. Our individual rights are the infrastructure of our country.

However, we cannot completely abandon common sense and factual information in the interpretation process of our laws.

A grandmother hitching a ride to the nursing home with her druggie son probably is not a conspirator to commit drug trafficking.

However, a young man rolling through a high-crime neighborhood at 3:16 a.m. who admits to carrying drugs to trade for sex might be guilty.

U.S. citizens trapped in the MATRIX

What is the MATRIX? It is as scary as being trapped within a network of deceit and treachery.

However, this MATRIX is controlled by your own government rather than a machine overlord.

CHRIS HARROP

As open season was declared for submitting counter-terrorism policy ideas following Sept. 11, 2001, the Total Information Awareness (TIA) project was undertaken by the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency's Information Awareness Office.

It was to be a "virtual, centralized, grand database" of personal information on American citizens.

The American Civil Liberties Union said the TIA project "may be the closest thing to a true 'Big Brother' program that has ever been seriously contemplated in the United States."

Even its logo gave off the air of an Orwellian controller. The all-seeing Eye of Providence looks over the globe with the now-corrupted phrase, "Knowledge is Power."

Thankfully, the TIA project and its data-mining goals were scuttled by Congress in September due to the obvious civil liberties concerns raised by its existence.

In its wake comes the MATRIX – Multistate Anti-TerroRism Information eXchange – project, run by Seisnet Inc. on behalf of a network of states including New York, Florida, Michigan and many others.

The single most abhorrent characteristic of the MATRIX project is the compiling and sharing of personal data concerning innocent Americans. The use of the network to find a pattern of behavior and personality might point the finger at innocent people whose lives were condensed and weighed by a computer program.

To those who feel this program could never be used for illicit purposes and our information is safe in the right hands, the ACLU found some interesting facts on Seisnet founder Hank Asher.

Apparently, Asher is a known drug smuggler who flew between Colombia and the United States with shipments of cocaine. This is whom we trust with our most sensitive data.

Privacy in America continues to take a beating. While no mention of this liberty is made in the Constitution as ratified, our legal system has evolved to ensure that every man, woman and child is entitled to a level of security in their persons.

Yet there is hope. Many members of Congress have become co-authors of the Benjamin Franklin True Patriot Act, a measure that can solve some of the undoing of privacy rights in America committed by the Departments of Justice and Homeland Security.

However, efforts cannot solely focus on federal- or national-level incursions against liberty. State-level projects such as the MATRIX project cannot fall under the public's radar, lest we allow our lives to be traced and accessible to any law enforcement official with access to the MATRIX.

Opposing the proliferation of the MATRIX project and supporting the efforts of true patriots in this age of forsaken liberties is vital to our legal traditions and our well-being as a nation.

As Benjamin Franklin said, "Those who would give up essential liberty, to purchase a little temporary safety, deserve neither liberty nor safety."

Marriage Proclamation offends many, not just homosexuals

Editor,

After hearing the cries of anguish, fear and rejection from members of QSA and others affected by the Marriage Protection Week Proclamation set forth by Mayor Mark Taussig, I feel I must respond.

Many believe this proclamation is aimed specifically at the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgendered, intersexed and questioning community. This is not true.

While the resolution does use language that implies the condemnation of homosexual marriage, several other groups are targeted – through even more specific language – in the proclamation.

Divorced men and women and couples who cohabit are specifically named in the resolution and are charged with attacking the venerated institution of marriage.

Even single folks, who comprise a good fraction of the students on campus, are indirectly targeted by this proclamation.

There are a number of people who feel this proclamation has devalued them as human beings. Is it all right to praise the marriage of some at the expense of the self-worth of others? I do not believe so.

Is it all right to praise the marriage of some at the expense of the self-worth of others? I do not believe so.

By passing this resolution, Student Governing Association would be affirming their respect for not only the GLBTIQ community, but for divorced persons, people who live with another person outside of marriage, and unmarried persons.

With regards to the "nature/nurture" argument regarding the origins of homosexuality and whether homosexuals should be permitted to marry, adopt and otherwise construct loving families, I have but one request.

It is the right of others to think and believe that. I do not wish to tread on those rights.

However, I encourage those people speak to someone who is gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgendered or intersexed and ask them about their experience to have a better understanding of what it is like to be a GLBTIQ person.

Margaret Wheatley, an author who will be coming to K-State later this year, wrote, "We do not fear the person whose story we know."

Queer folks have stories.

We have stories about what it was like to come out.

We have stories about churches, synagogues and other places of worship – places we loved and where we thought we would be loved – that told us we weren't welcome anymore.

We have stories about family members who disowned us.

We have stories about the pain we have experienced pretending to be something we were never meant to be to avoid ridicule.

We have dreams to share about our futures.

But we also have fears.

Fears of a world that will never embrace us for who we are and what we cannot control.

Fears of a society that will not permit us to come together in a loving, stable relationship.

Fears that others will deny us the opportunity to offer a home filled with love to a child.

Fears that someone on the street may physically harm us because we are who we are.

I implore all of you who do not personally know a queer individual to find someone who is gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgendered, intersexed or questioning and ask them about their experiences.

We are in class with you, we're your professors, we sit next to you in church and many of us want families.

I do not expect everyone so upset by our desire for affirmation to experience some epiphany and have a complete reversal of thought. Instead, I just wish to promote understanding between the GLBTIQ community and those who have never been exposed to it.

Let us all work together to build the bridge from both sides of this chasm, that we might meet in the middle.

Partial-birth abortions unproven as medically necessary

Editor,

I am writing in response to several letters about the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, but especially Carolina Leon's, which ran in the Oct. 24 issue.

She claims the act will outlaw "common procedures used after the first trimester, but well before fetal viability."

I don't know exactly what definition she used for "fetal viability," but if she refers to the beginning of life, she seems to be sadly mistaken, as before the end of the first trimester, babies have response to stimuli, especially pain – even more so than a newborn or a young child.

Abortion doctors have described the procedure by saying that they crush the baby's skull, after which the carcass just slides right out. There is a very important thing to notice here: they must kill the child first. It is of course, impossible, to kill something which is not alive.

I realize there is much debate about exactly when life in its truest form begins, but I would much rather be safe and offer up a child for adoption by a couple who cannot have children of their own.

I wonder if Leon actually has read the bill, which states, "This subsection does not apply to a partial birth abortion that is necessary to save the life of a mother...." This sounds like exactly the sort of exception which she and many other opponents claim the bill does not contain.

In regards to the case of the Nebraska law that was struck down, the bill does say, "Neither the plaintiff ... nor the experts who testified on his behalf, have identified a single circumstance during which a partial birth abortion was necessary to preserve the health of a woman."

As an alternative to a late-term abortion, assuming the mother would survive the procedures banned in this bill, merely giving birth to the child would save the life of a mother threatened by the pregnancy, without actually killing the child.

Then, if the child is not viable, it would, of course, die a natural death, but there would be a chance to save it.

The bill also has included a clause to protect the mother.

Upon the Senate's passing of the bill, Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., said the president "will become the first United States president to criminalize a safe medical procedure."

I want to know for whom this procedure is safe. It certainly is not the innocent child.

Student gets chance to play with EA Sports All-Stars

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tomorrow, while the majority of K-State students will be going to class, thinking about that next test or studying, Kurt Childs will have something else on his mind.

His jump shot.

As part of the EA Sports student walk-on program, Childs, senior in industrial engineering, was selected to take the floor with the EA Sports All-Stars when they clash with the Wildcats at 7 p.m. Thursday in Bramlage Coliseum.

The "Rudy" program, as it is termed, takes place on a number of campuses across the country, which the All-Stars visit on their tour of preseason exhibition games.

Deke Nolan, EA Sports representative, views the program as an opportunity for the gaming franchise to reward a constituency that has given so much to them.

"College students have always been big into gaming and supporting EA Sports, and this is a way to give back," Nolan said.

Childs will be able to warm up with the team, sit on the bench and has the possibility of seeing court time.

Not only will he have the chance to compete against the Wildcats, but the talent he will be suiting up with will be far from average.

The EA Sports roster consists of Claire Coggins, a 5-foot-11 guard from Lee's Summit, Mo., is one of five freshmen making their first appearance for K-State, which opens its 2003-04 season with an exhibition game against Washburn at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Ichabods are no slouches, though. The Division-II school finished 30-4 last season.

The Wildcats return their entire roster from last season's record-setting 29-5 team that advanced to the second round of the NCAA Tournament for the second consecutive year.

Still, Coach Deb Patterson said an upset loss to Notre Dame in the NCAA Tournament last March – on the Cats' home floor – fueled off-season workouts that have led up to tonight's game.

"I think we're very hungry, very experienced and gaining that confidence," said Patterson, who begins her eighth season in Manhattan.

"For them, the next level of expectations is getting back to the Sweet 16 and to advance another step."

Having five new faces on the bench will help the Wildcats do just that, Patterson said. The last two seasons, a lack of depth has caused K-State to flounder down the stretch.

"The cold, hard reality is that the rigors of the season have taken a toll as we get to mid-March," she said. "It's an encouragement to finally have some depth inside and outside."

Cats look to build on 10-match winning streak

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They have the highest ranking in school history, yet they probably wouldn't know it if you asked them.

The fifth-ranked K-State volleyball team takes a 10-match winning streak into tonight's match against Iowa State. First serve is set for 6 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

Coach Suzie Fritz was one who said she doesn't put an emphasis on what her team is ranked during the season.

"We don't pay that much attention to it," Fritz said. "The only ranking I'm paying attention to is the one that comes out at the end of the year."

That doesn't mean she isn't pleased with where her team stands.

"I'm certainly happy that we're ranked in the top 10, and I think the team deserves to be in the top 10, but we certainly don't put a lot of priority on it," Fritz said.

This year's squad is off to its best start since K-State entered NCAA play in 1981, and the second best start since they began the 1977 season 24-3-1.

The Cats also are off to their best conference start – 12-1 – since the inception of the Big 12 in 1996.

Yet Fritz remains reluctant in calling this one of the best teams she's ever been a part of at K-State.

"It remains to be seen if we can sustain some momentum here late in the conference and if we can go on the road and win some difficult matches at Missouri and Texas late in the year," Fritz said. "If we can we make a run late in the tournament, that will determine whether it's the best team we've ever had."

Women's golf team takes 3rd in final fall tourney

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's golf team rallied to finish third in its last tournament of the fall season. The Cats had entered the final day of the Edwin Watts/Palmetto in Kiawah Island, S.C., tied for eighth.

Notre Dame took first with 892 strokes. K-State was 17 shots off the pace with 909. Big 12 rival Texas Tech came in second, a shot in front of the Wildcats. East Carolina and Coastal Carolina rounded out the top five. KU finished 11th out of the 14 teams competing in the event.

K-State senior Christine Boucher finished fifth among individuals after posting scores of 76, 74 and 71. Boucher placed in the top five of every tournament she played in this fall. She was only four shots behind Eastern Carolina's Adrienne Millican who won the tournament with a score of 217.

The Edwin Watts/Palmetto was played at the Oak Point Golf Course. Last year Boucher placed second at the tournament. As an All-Big 12 Selection last Spring, Boucher finished first, and

In the middle of campus lies a building where great things are happening.

We have a team here at K-State that is ranked fifth in the nation and eighth in attendance.

For those of you who live in a cave, it isn't the football team.

No, our Wildcat volleyball team is sitting atop the Big 12, with a season highlighted by a 3-2 win at Nebraska on Oct. 11.

It was the first time the Cats had ever won in Lincoln, and only the second time in school history they had defeated the rival Huskers.

Tonight, they will return home after a 3-1 victory over Colorado on Saturday to face Iowa State at 6 in Ahearn Field House.

Although they are eighth in attendance, their average of 1,833 in the first ten matches leaves room for improvement.

Not to knock on the fans who have been great, but there are still an abundance of Ahearn's 11,700 seats to be filled.

So tonight, go out and support your school and cheer for these ladies as they bring a 10-match winning streak to the table.

Suspended running back Maurice Clarett has dropped a federal complaint seeking a $2.5 million fine against Ohio State for releasing information from an NCAA investigation to prosecutors.

Clarett

In his court motion, Clarett reserved the right to renew the complaint if he could get backing from the U.S. Department of Education, which oversees the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act he accuses the school of violating.

MLB | American League announces Gold Gloves

Suzuki

All nine winners had previously earned the honor for fielding excellence. There were seven repeat winners from last season — New York Yankees pitcher Mike Mussina and Cameron rejoined the list this year.

Texas shortstop Alex Rodriguez, Oakland third baseman Eric Chavez, Minnesota outfielder Torii Hunter and Anaheim catcher Bengie Molina also were chosen.

MLB | Donnie Baseball returns to Yankees

Mattingly

Mattingly replaces Rick Down, who was fired last week after New York hit just .140 with runners in scoring position during its six-game loss to Florida in the World Series.

Willie Randolph, who had been third-base coach for the last 10 years, becomes bench coach in place of Don Zimmer, who quit the day after the Series loss, saying he would never again work for Steinbrenner.

MLB | Jeter played Series with ruptured tendon

Jeter

Cashman also said the New York Yankees are declining David Wells' $6 million option but have not decided whether they want the 40-year-old left-hander back next season. The Yankees also declined the $1.7 million option on left-hander Felix Heredia.

MLB | Mariners sign Martinez to one more year

The Seattle Mariners agreed to a 1-year deal with Edgar Martinez, keeping the designated hitter in the majors for an 18th season.

Martinez, who turns 41 in January, has won two AL batting titles and holds several franchise records, including career batting average, games played, hits, extra-base hits, doubles, RBI, walks and runs. He also was named to his seventh AL All-Star team last season.

Wizard of Oz Museum to open in Wamego next week

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Follow the yellow brick road.

Follow it to Wamego, Kan., to visit the new Oz Museum. The museum, scheduled to open next week, will feature collections of "Wizard of Oz" memorabilia, from Frank Baum's books in 1900 to present-day collectibles.

Jim Ginavan, curator of the museum, said the dream of opening a museum has been drawn out for eight years.

"In 1995, there was a collection called the Century of Oz at the Columbian Theatre. The man who had the collection at that show said he would loan us the memorabilia if we could build a museum to house the collection permanently," he said.

The first steps inside the doors of the museum lands visitors in the yard of Dorothy Gale. After traversing through the house and passing through a screen door, visitors find themselves in Munchkin Land. The storyline continues when all characters are picked up from the movie. First the scarecrow, then the Tin Man, the Cowardly Lion, and the list goes on.

Ginavan said the building that houses the museum has been recently renovated. He said tourists are the number one expected customers to the Oz Museum.

"We have yet to open, but we've left the front doors open for a while," Ginavan said. "We have been working in the back, heard knocks, and let people in from Colorado, Wyoming and other places. They've seen the billboards, and we are glad to have them."

Ginavan said visitors haven't been disappointed with their visits so far – even though the museum isn't open.

"Even with the tremendous amount of construction and the mess that we've got on our hands, people are still happy," he said.

The grand-opening for the museum will be in a couple months.

"We want to do a softer opening and a bigger hoopla later on," Ginavan said. "We want to do a little more advertising and have our doors open for a month or two."

Kelly Pearl, development associate for the Pottawatomie County Economic Development Office, said the Wamego economy will benefit from the opening of the museum.

"People are already starting to show for the museum, and it's not even open," she said. "This will definitely become a large attraction to the tourists. People usually don't stop in Wamego, but this will give them a reason to."

Pearl said the county beat Johnson County for the award, who had kept the award recognition since 1981.

"There are lots of aspects that have played into winning the award this year. There were a lot of tourists and notoriety that came with it, and the Oz Museum may be part of what wins us the award for 2003," Pearl said.

Laura Atwood, owner of DeLacey's Lane, a gift shop in Wamego, said the Oz Museum will positively affect business in Wamego.

"The traffic on Highway 99 is getting heavier, and on K-State home game days, we notice lots of traffic. When people see there is more to offer in Wamego, they will stop and check it all out," Atwood said.

'Queer' Evolution: how changes in a word's connotation hint at changes in society

By Martha Irvine
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO – Something queer is happening to the word "queer."

Originally a synonym for "odd" or "unusual," the word evolved into an anti-gay insult in the last century, only to be reclaimed by defiant gay and lesbian activists who chanted: "We're here, we're queer, get used to it."

Now "queer" is sneaking into the mainstream - and taking on a hipster edge as a way to describe any sexual orientation beyond straight.

"Hey Jay," a straight co-worker recently said. "Have you met the new guy? He's really cute and queer, too. Just your type!"

It's the kind of exchange that still makes many gay or straight wince. That's because, in the 1920s and '30s the word "queer" became synonymous with "pansy," "sissy" and even "pervert," says Gregory Ward, a Northwestern University linguist who teaches a course on language and sexuality.

Now, Ward says, the increasing use of "queer" as in the prime-time TV show titles "Queer Eye for the Straight Guy" and "Queer as Folk" is changing the word's image.

"It's really losing the hurtful and quasi-violent nature it had," Ward says.

The title of one current ad: "Nice Guy for the Queer Guy."

Meanwhile, a recent review in the Chicago Tribune's Metromix entertainment guide defined the crowd in a new upscale bar as "model-types and young clubbers amid dressy Trixies, middle-aged Gold Coast cigar-chompers and queer-eyed straight guys" (the latter term referring to straight men who've spiffed themselves up).

And while some in the gay community began using the word in the last decade or two as an umbrella term for "gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered," today's young people say that "queer" encompasses even more.

"I love it because, in one word, you can refer to the alphabet soup of gay, lesbian, bisexual, questioning, 'heteroflexible,' 'omnisexual,' 'pansexual' and all of the other shades of difference in that fluid, changing arena of human sexuality," says 27-year-old Stacy Harbaugh. She's the program coordinator for the Indiana Youth Group, a drop-in center in Indianapolis for youth who may place themselves into any of those categories.

"I find myself attracted to boy-like girls and girl-like boys," Harbaugh adds. "If 'lesbian' or 'bi' doesn't seem to fit, 'queer' certainly does."

Heteroflexible? Pansexual? The growing list of terms can be downright boggling.

James Cross, a 26-year-old Chicagoan, personally likes the term "metrosexual," meant to describe straight men like him who are into designer clothes, love art and fashion and even enjoy shopping (much like "queer-eyed straight guys").

He's also noticed the word "queer" being bandied about more often, especially at the public relations firm where he works. But he says women are "definitely more comfortable" with it.

"I hate to admit it, but I certainly wear masks with the term. When I'm at work and talking with women, I'm down with it," he says. "But when I'm out on the rugby pitch or drinking beer with my 'bros,' I'm just one of the guys."

Indeed, use of a word that carries so much baggage can cause confusion.

Andy Rohr, a 26-year-old gay man living in Boston, noted that when a straight co-worker told him she liked the show "Queer Eye for the Straight Guy."

"She whispered the word 'queer,'" he says.

Dan Cordella says he, too, is perplexed about what he "can and can't say."

"An entire generation of suburban youth was taught to practically walk on eggshells with their wording around those that, one, chose an alternative lifestyle and, two, were of a different ethnic background," says Cordella, a 26-year-old straight man who lives in New York and grew up outside Boston.

Ward, the Northwestern linguist, says that people are wise to use "queer" carefully because it is still "very context-sensitive."

"It really matters who says it and why they're saying it," he says.

Minting of 50 state quarters reaches halfway point

By Jeannine Aversa
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – On the road to change, the quarters are halfway there.

The U.S. Mint's 50-state quarter program, which began with Delaware and will end with Hawaii, reached the halfway mark last week with the debut of the Arkansas 25-cent piece.

Quarters are produced in the order that the states ratified the U.S. Constitution and joined the Union. The states come up with the design, which features images or themes honoring the state.

"Discovery and innovation has been the strongest theme," as seen on the North Carolina, Virginia, Missouri and other state quarters, said Henrietta Holsman Fore, director of the Mint.

Most states also have opted for an outline of their state, she said. Other themes include the land and natural beauty, state capitals, liberty, courage and music.

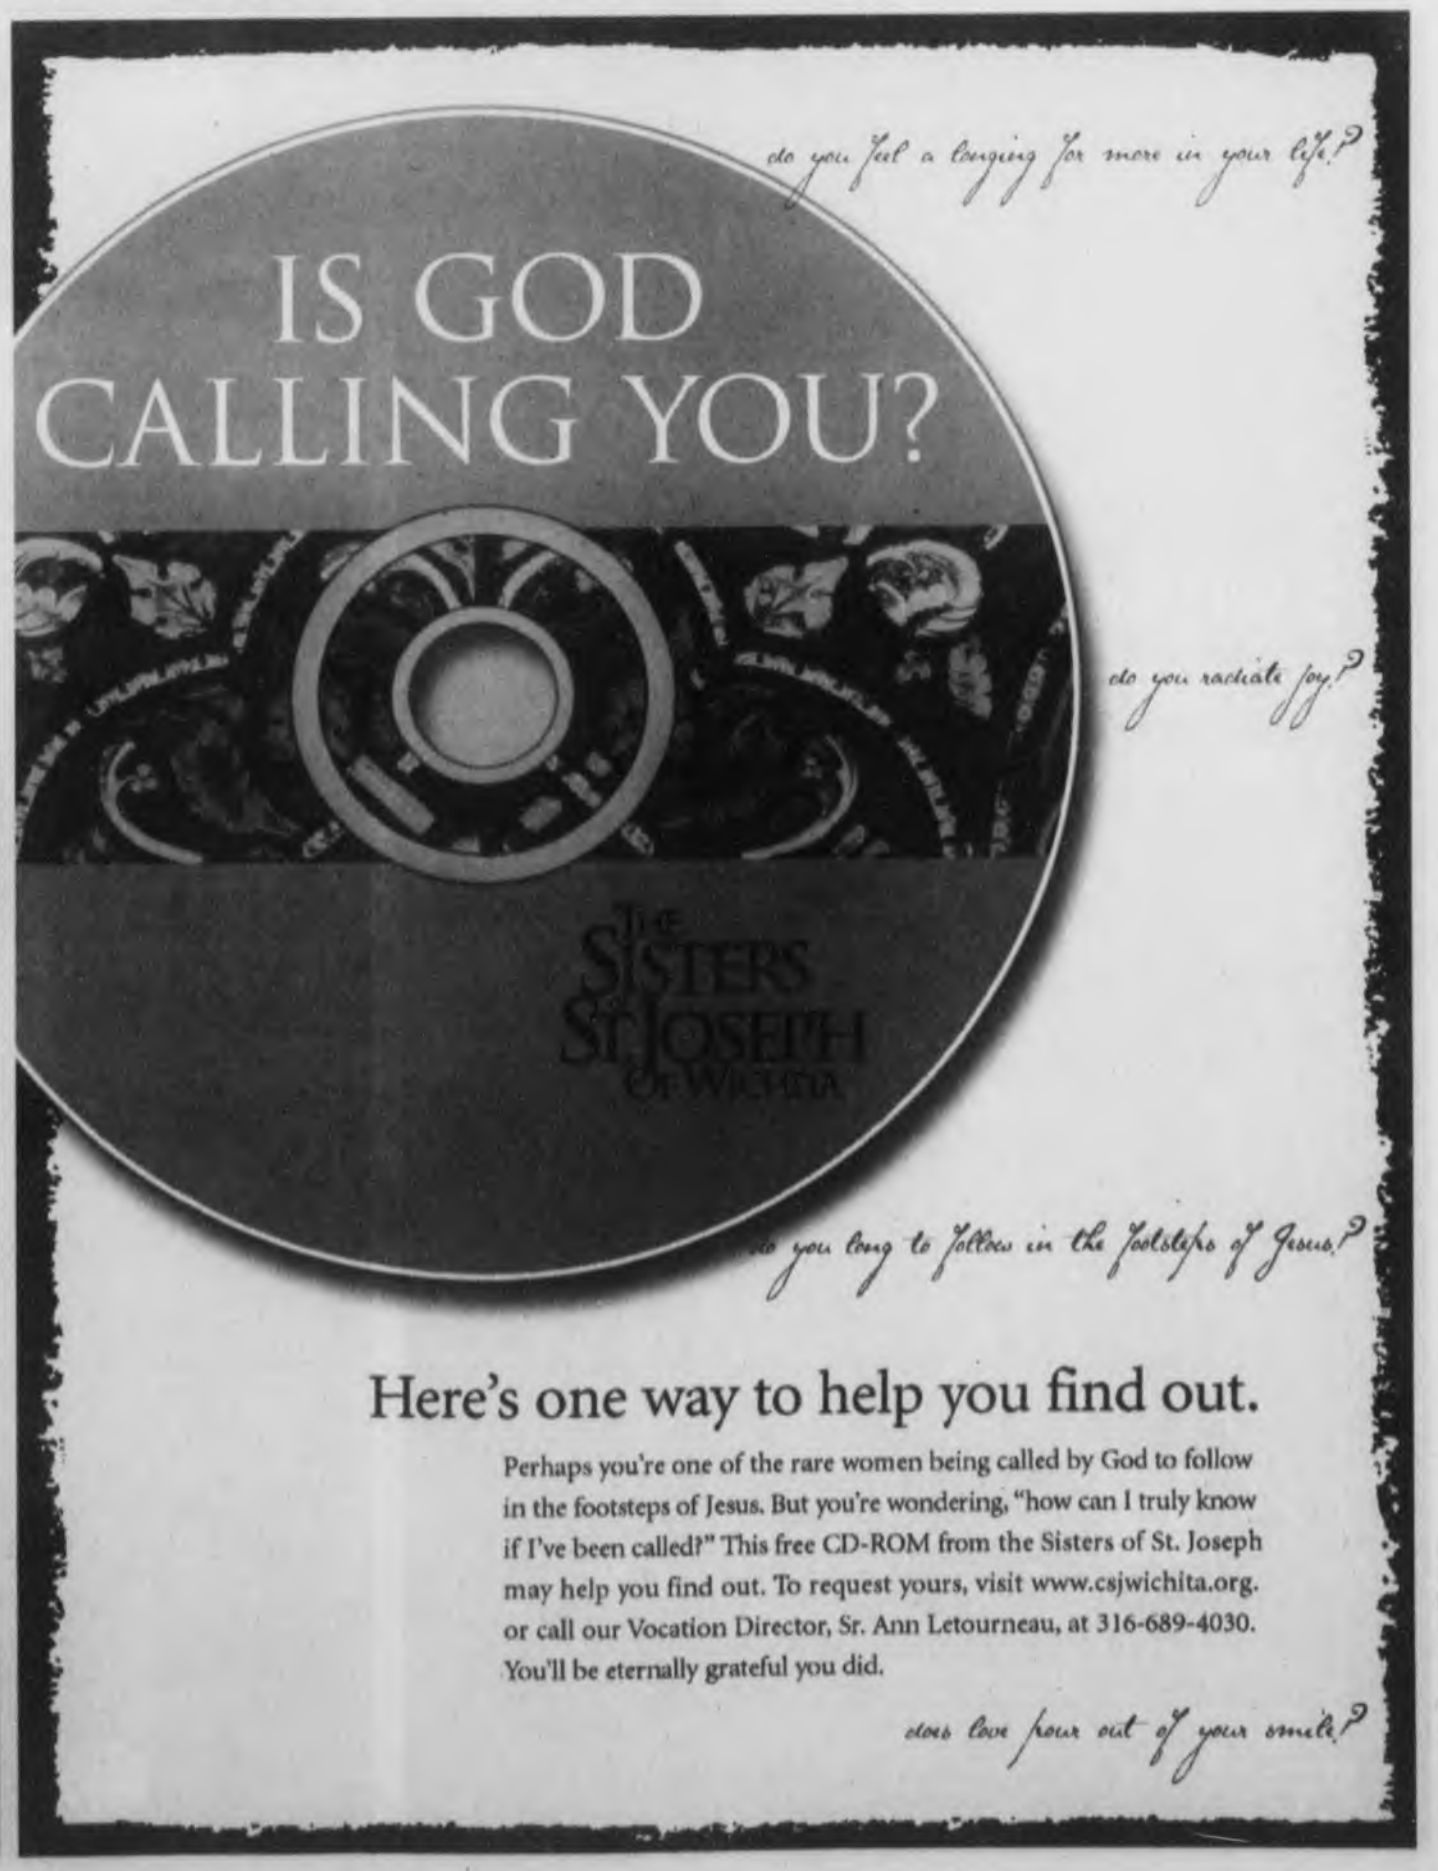
Including the release of the Missouri coin, No. 24, the Mint has produced 20.8 billion state quarters since the program began in 1999.

How many quarters are minted depends on the country's overall demand for coins, Fore said.

"If the economy is strong, it increases the usage of all coins and thus there is higher demand to mint and when the economy is slow there is less demand," she said.

The three quarters with the highest mintage Virginia, 1.59 billion, Connecticut, 1.35 billion, and South Carolina, 1.3 billion all were made before the 2001 recession hit.



The Maine quarter has the lowest mintage, 448.8 million, followed by Missouri, 453.2 million, and Alabama, 457.4 million. All three coins were produced this year, as the economy struggled to get back on firmer footing.

In good economic times or bad, the state quarters have led to "a renaissance for coin collecting in America," Fore said.

Roughly 130 million Americans collect the state quarters, Fore said. "That represents at least one state quarter collector in every household," she said.

WASHBURN | 5 new women's basketball players ready to take court

One of those new ingredients is Coggins, who preseason All-Big 12 forward Kendra Wecker said brings vocal leadership and increased communication to the floor.

Wecker also said the freshmen class, including Coggins, make the incumbents work that much harder.

"It definitely makes you know your spot isn't secure," Wecker said. "The competition in practice to compete for spots is a lot better than it has been."

Coggins averaged more than 17 points per game in leading Lee's Summit North to the Missouri Class 4A state championship last season, and the semi-finals the previous two seasons.

She has 14 school records, was rated the nation's 14th-best guard by the All-Star Girl's Report and was honorable mention All-American by Street & Smith's Magazine.

But what Coggins brings to the wing, Patterson said, is a physical presence complimenting Megan Mahoney, Laurie Koehn and Chelsea Domenico.

"Claire brings a big, physical dimension at the wing spot, much like Megan Mahoney, only stronger," Patterson said. "She'll be a tremendous shooter, penetrator and slasher."

What Coggins said she brings to the floor, however, differs just slightly.

"Hopefully, I'll be someone who can take care of the ball," she said. "I'll feed Nicole (Ohlde) and Kendra whenever they're open – just not do anything too out there at first."

But that doesn't mean she won't be talking all night long.

"I'm pretty out there sometimes," Coggins said. "I second-guess myself, wondering if I'm saying the right thing. But we're all out there for the same purpose – to get better and get to the Final Four."

tied for third, second and fifth in five tournaments during the abbreviated fall season.

Junior Sarah Heffel shooting a 76 in all three rounds, finished 17th. Senior Karen Quintelier shot 82, 77 and 75 and tied for 37th. Freshman Helene Robert had an 83 after opening with rounds of 78 and 75. Robert tied for 45th.

Playing for the team in her first tournament of the season junior Stephanie Limoges tied for 40th. Limoges shot a final round 76 to rebound from an 80 in tournament's second round.

K-State's third place finish was its second in as many tournaments. The Wildcats were third at the Notre Dame Adidas Invitational in Palm Harbor, Fla., Oct. 19-21.

The Cats won their only home tournament of the season while playing host to the Marilynn Smith/Sunflower Invitational Oct. 13 and 14 at Colbert Hills.

The Cats came in sixth place at the Price's Give 'em Five Challenge Oct. 6 and 8. K-State took second at the Chip-N-Club Invitational in Lincoln Nebraska Sept. 15 and 16.

In the first four tournaments Sarah Heffel placed 43rd, tied for sixth, tied for 14th and 47th. Robert finished tied for 15th, tied for 44th, tied for 18th and tied for fifth.

Quintelier tied for 21st, tied for 41st, tied for sixth and tied for 20th. Freshmen Katy Heffel tied for 39th, tied for 58th, came in 36th and tied for 64th in four starts.

K-State returns all nine players for the spring season.

VOLLEYBALL | Fritz eyes possibility of hosting NCAA tourney

Whether this team is the best in K-State history, one thing of importance has been crossing its mind.

With their record, the Cats have put themselves in the position to be a host team for the first two rounds of NCAA Tournament.

"We have a legitimate chance," Fritz said. "We'd certainly rather be at home the first two rounds than go on the road.

Fritz said that despite the success her team has had thus far, she had been expecting a lot from this year's squad. The seniors, she said, drew the most of those expectations.

"I expect this team to do tremendous things," Fritz said, "not only because they're capable of it – the expectations have been high for this group and this group of seniors from the first day they got here. The true mark in whether a class is successful isn't measured until after they're done, after they've graduated, and what they've been able to accomplish over time."

Success will be the only thing on their minds tonight, Fritz said.

"This class has been able to accomplish a significant amount over time, but there's no way they have exceeded my expectations," Fritz said. "We expected to be good and win a lot of matches, and hopefully that will continue."

WALK-ON | K-State student selected to play with All-Stars team

former NBA notables such as Ed O'Bannon, Drew Barry, Ricky Price and Randy Livingston.

O'Bannon, a former ninth draft pick of the New Jersey Nets, was the 1995 NCAA Tournament MVP and a unanimous first-team All-American that season.

Sharing the floor with former pros and Division-I athletes has Childs thrilled.

"One reason I'm excited to play is to be able to suit up and sit with such great basketball players," he said.

Basketball already is in Childs' blood. A native of Belleville, Kan., he helped lead his high school team to a Class 3A state title his junior year.

In fact, Childs played against Wildcat guard Blake Bauer during his career.

"I'm looking forward to playing against Blake," Childs said. "It'd be fun to go against him and joke around with him."

Although Childs will be a part of the All-Stars team, there is no guarantee he actually will play. It is up to the coach's discretion as to whether the student walk-on will enter the game.

Chris Kearney, senior in architectural engineering, was the selected "Rudy" last season and went 2-2 from the free-throw stripe late in the game, putting him in the score book.

"It was pretty neat to score. I had a lot of adrenaline going shooting those free throws," Kearney said. "Everybody was cheering me on, even though it was against K-State."

Kearney also felt the All-Stars treated him as part of the team.

"All the guys on the team were good guys, and the coaches were real nice," he said.

As for Childs' preparation, he does not plan on doing anything to get ready for the game.

But there is one equipment issue he might need to address.

"I might need to get some new shoes, because mine our pretty old," Childs said.

Student-directed play examines the numerous roles of women in modern society

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four women with distinct personalities bound by family is the focus of one of Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Lee Blessing's lesser known plays, "Independence."

Aubrey Kershner, who is directing "Independence" as her master's thesis, said she first read it because of her respect for Blessing's work. She found a book he'd written of specifically women-based plays and found "Independence," which she liked for its low production.

"I didn't have any preconceived notions of what it was supposed to be or what I would do with it," Kershner said. "I read it and I was so impressed with the characters that were in it because they represent numerous roles that women play in their lifetime."

Because "Independence" has such strong female roles, the characters exude a universality.

"This is a play that focuses on women's lives, but every husband, every son, any male can identify with women like this at some time in their lives," said Rachel Potucek, graduate student in speech, who plays Evelyn, the mother of the family. "Every woman will think 'that's just like my sister,' or, 'that's just like my aunt or my mom or my daughter.'

"It's something everyone can relate to – all the characters have a lot of substance to them."

"Independence," set in May 2003, is the story of the Briggs women, a mother and three daughters, who live in the small town of Independence.

Evelyn was committed to the local mental institute by her oldest daughter, Kess, and was released two months later. Kess returns home after a four-year absence because her sister Jo called to tell her of a mysterious crisis developing at the Briggs' home.

"It's a drama, but there's so much comedy involved because it's based on a family and as we all know some of the best comedy takes place in family drama," Kershner said. "There's something for everyone in this play and they don't have to worry about coming out of here and being exhausted because of the drama they just sat through."

Because the town Independence is so small, Kess – a college professor and lesbian – had been shunned for her sexual orientation.

J.J. Wickham, senior in theater, who plays Kess, said playing a lesbian came pretty easy to her.

"Basically, I am pretty open-minded about homosexuality and sexuality in general," Wickham said. "With that, I really didn't find it that challenging that I could love a woman."

Rachel Fox, freshman in theater, who plays Jo, said her character looks up to Kess even though Jo is disappointed in Kess because she's lesbian.

"Jo is the good child in the family to a degree," she said, "has a lot of issues with her sisters, but they're just not as apparent."

Jo has been a virgin most of her life and then becomes pregnant and has to deal with the child, her crazy mother and annoying younger sister.

Her crazy younger sister is Sherry, who is weeks away from graduating from high school, played by Mindy Sedam, junior in elementary education. Sedam said Sherry does whatever she wants and doesn't worry about what people think.

"I'm very blunt – a wild child and probably the black sheep of the family," she said. "Sherry says she's the first lady of meaningless sex."

Despite Sherry's amoral behavior Sedam said she does identify with her character's wild streak.

"She likes to go out and party and that's so me," she said. "I like to make jokes about getting into character because she's so me."

Student undergoes ultimate prank at the hands of friends

A narrative by Jacob Walker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the days of my stupid youth, I liked to make a big deal out of personal holidays: birthdays, half-birthdays and things like that. It was really freaking annoying, I'm sure.

My 19th birthday came during my freshman year, and I eagerly returned home for Thanksgiving weekend, anticipating an orgy of praise and celebration upon the annual celebration of my birth.

I spent the day before endlessly reminding friends of the next day's importance and saying things like, "We should do something" and, "We'll get something together."

I went to bed that night after making sure the house was all locked up, and fell asleep with a smile.

But before I could drift off to dreamland, I was awaken by a slight pressure on my body. I tried to sit up, but I couldn't – my whole body was being pinned down. Still mostly asleep, I stayed silent and could hear whispers in the room around me.

Fully conscious now, I began to thrash my whole body, but to no avail. I felt someone put a cloth hat over my eyes, and then the lights were turned on.

I heard someone say "We're gonna need more duct tape – oh wait, he has some right here."

I felt hands wrapping the tape around the blanket I was in, securing my lower body while my hands were being taped behind my back.

Damn, I thought. Betrayed by my own tape.

By now I had recognized the voices and I knew that my assailants were just friends, but I was not prepared for the sight before me when the hat was removed.

My room was full. Nine people, all good expletive deleted friends, were gathered around. The three guys in charge of holding me down and applying duct tape were at the foot of the bed, looking fairly winded.

The group, comprised of girls and guys, stood around cheering at their success. I noticed one of them was holding a camcorder to document the occasion.

As I began to hurl death threats left and right, a strip of duct tape was put over my mouth. The ringleader, a cheeky blonde girl, told me that it would be a lot easier on me if I just played along.

In response, I chewed through the tape over my face and began cussing them, their mothers and the goats their parents might or might not have abused. They then wrapped the tape completely around my head several times – heedless of any of my shaggy blonde hair caught in the mix.

Three oafs picked me up and carried me out to their waiting car. Remember, this is November and I am nearly naked, wearing only my boxer-briefs. Having already considered this fact, my friends decided the best car for me to ride in was a convertible with the top down.

I was transported to the ringleader's house and deposited on a freezing cold tarp in her backyard.

For the next half hour, the following items/condiments were poured, slathered and stuck to my body: Vaseline, instant tanning lotion, pancake syrup, peanut butter and Tang drink mix, of all things. For the finale, my ex-girlfriend smashed eggs over my head.

Ow. My pride.

After they cut me loose and I finished chasing them all around, I was able to shower with a garden hose and put clothes on. For my consolation prize and to ease their guilt about tearing my hair out with duct tape, they took me out to IHOP.

To top it off, we all watched the video tape together in one big happy group. Luckily, I have a sense of humor so none of them were killed.

This year, I just want to go bowling.

U.S. compound comes under fire

By Robert H. Reid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

US Army, 101st Airborne | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
An unidentified soldier kneels as soldiers of the 101st Airborne Division's 501st Signal Battalion came together in Mosul on Monday to remember Spc. Maurice J. Johnson, who was killed by an improvised explosive device in Mosul, Iraq, on Saturday. Johnson of Levittown, Pa., was killed as his convoy drove through the city of Mosul.

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Insurgents struck Tuesday at the center of the U.S.-led occupation, firing mortars after sundown at the heavily guarded district that includes major American facilities. Three people were wounded, the Pentagon said.

Huge explosions thundered throughout central Baghdad about 7:45 p.m. as the insurgents targeted the 2-square-mile "Green Zone," which includes coalition headquarters, the military press center and other key facilities.

Iraqi police said two mortars fell in the zone, but U.S. officials said the headquarters itself, located in one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces, was not damaged.

However, the huge detonation sent coalition staffers running into the hallways. It was the second mortar attack against the Green Zone in as many days.

At the Pentagon, spokesman Lt. Col. Jim Cassella said three people were wounded in the attacks but it was unclear if they were military or civilians.

Cassella said there appeared to have been three explosions, possibly from mortars or rockets.

The attack underscored the precarious security situation in the city. Late Monday, three mortars exploded in the center of Baghdad. U.S. officials said one struck a camp of the 2nd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which provides security in the palace district. Officials said there was no damage nor casualties.

The deteriorating security situation has prompted the United Nations, the international Red Cross and other international organizations to reduce their foreign staffs.

On Tuesday, Foreign Minister Ana Palacio said Spain will withdraw 25 of the 29-member Spanish diplomatic staff from Baghdad. Most will be relocated to Amman, Jordan. Spain has about 1,300 soldiers in Iraq and was one of the strongest supporters of the U.S.-led invasion.

"We have taken staff out of Baghdad temporarily given that it is a very complicated moment," Palacio said in Berlin. Spaniards working for the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority will stay, the Spanish Defense Ministry said without giving their number.

Spain became the third coalition member to withdraw diplomats from Iraq because of stepped-up insurgent attacks. Last month, Bulgaria and the Netherlands moved their diplomats to Jordan, also citing worsening security.

Those fears increased after a dramatic escalation in attacks, starting with the Oct. 26 missile barrage against the Al-Rasheed Hotel, where many coalition and U.S. military officials lived. One U.S. colonel was killed and 18 people were wounded.

On Sunday, guerrillas near Fallujah shot down a U.S. Army Chinook helicopter, killing 15 soldiers in the bloodiest single strike against American forces since the war began March 20.

Violence persisted Tuesday when a roadside bomb killed a 1st Armored Division soldier and wounded two others in Baghdad.

In the northern city of Mosul, insurgents using small arms fire and rocket-propelled grenades attacked a hotel housing American troops but caused no casualties, the military said.

Three grenades hit the building and two others landed in the compound as U.S. forces returned fire. A police station in Mosul also was struck overnight by a rocket-propelled grenade, the military said Tuesday. There were no casualties.

Also in Mosul – Iraq's third-largest city, which had been relatively quiet – gunmen killed a judge near his home. Ismail Youssef, a Christian, was the second Iraqi judge assassinated in as many days.

On Monday, Judge Muhan Jabr al-Shuweily, head of an Iraqi court investigating members of Saddam's Baath Party, was abducted and murdered in the southern city of Najaf. A colleague who was kidnapped with him but spared said the killers appeared to be Saddam supporters.

Elsewhere, insurgents Tuesday ambushed a U.S. patrol with rocket-propelled grenades in Khaldiyah, a town west of Baghdad in the volatile "Sunni Triangle," witnesses said. There were no reports of casualties and no confirmation from the U.S. command.

The Arabic language satellite television station Al-Jazeera reported an ambush Tuesday near Samara north of the capital and broadcast pictures of cheering Iraqis displaying American ammunition as a truck burned in the background.

U.S. troops, meanwhile, raided the village of Karasia near Tikrit late Monday, arresting two suspects and seizing Kalashnikov rifles, 14 mortar rounds, a mortar tube, and rocket-propelled grenades and launchers, the military said.

In Mosul, gunmen killed a provincial judge Tuesday near his home. Ismail Youssef, a Christian, was a deputy to the head of the appeal courts in Nineveh province.

On Monday, the head of an Iraqi court who was investigating members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party, Muhan Jabr al-Shuweily, was abducted and murdered in the southern city Najaf.

A colleague who was spared said he believed the killers were supporters of Saddam.

The Spanish withdrawal followed the slaying of a Spanish navy captain in the truck bombing of the U.N. headquarters in Baghdad on Aug. 19, and the Oct. 9 killing of a Spanish sergeant working for military intelligence. Security at the Spanish Embassy had been stepped up in recent weeks.

U.N. security coordinator and acting head of U.N. mission in Iraq step down

By Edith M. Lederer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS – The U.N. security coordinator and acting head of the U.N. mission in Iraq are stepping down while independent experts assess responsibility for lapses in the bombing of U.N. headquarters in Baghdad, U.N. officials announced Tuesday.

The Aug. 19 attack killed 22 people, including top U.N. envoy Sergio Vieira de Mello, and wounded more than 150 others.

On Tuesday, Secretary-General Kofi Annan appointed a team of four experts to determine accountability at all managerial levels at headquarters and in the field for the security failures that led to so many casualties, U.N. associate spokesman Stephane Dujarric said.

Tun Myat of Myanmar, the security chief since July 2002, and Ramiro Lopes da Sliva of Portugal, the acting head of the U.N. mission who was responsible for security at the time of the bombing, have asked to be relieved of their present responsibilities while the team conducts its work, Dujarric said.

When Dujarric was asked whether it wasn't unusual that both men asked to step down and whether, in fact, they were asked to leave their posts, he reiterated that they asked to be relieved of their duties.

In a letter to more than 25,000 U.N. staffers worldwide Friday, Annan promised to take immediate action to implement recommendations made by a U.N.-appointed panel in a highly critical report.

The report blamed "dysfunctional" U.N. security for unnecessary casualties. Former Finnish President Martti Ahtisaari, who led the panel, said the United Nations must address the issue of accountability.

The four-member team appointed by Annan to assess responsibility will be headed by Gerald Walzer, former U.N. deputy high commissioner for refugees.

The other members are Srinath Basnayake, a former director of legal division in the U.N. legal office; assistant Irish police commissioner Kevin Carty; and Stuart Groves, senior security manager in the office of the U.N. high commissioner for human rights.

While the team is conducting its investigation, U.N. Undersecretary-General for Management Catherine Bertini will oversee the U.N. security office.

Annan told the staff he was gravely concerned at the findings of the Ahtisaari panel and was reviewing "the serious weaknesses" in the management of the U.N. security system as well as threats facing U.N. missions worldwide.

"We have started making quite a lot of changes even in Baghdad," he said Monday.

Last week, Annan ordered the temporary withdrawal of the world body's international staff from Baghdad for consultations with a team from U.N. headquarters following a surge in attacks.

Fewer than 20 foreign staffers were still in the Iraqi capital, and Annan said Monday that "in principle they should all be out or on their way out."

Court rules against newspaper

Newspaper claimed university's board of trustees met in secret; editors considering an appeal

MICHIGAN – A state district court ruled last week that the Oakland University board of trustees did not violate the Michigan Open Meetings Act when it had a meeting in secret.

Judge Richard D. Kuhn ruled Thursday that imposing the open-meetings law on the board of trustees would infringe on the board's constitutional right to govern the public university's internal affairs.

The court also said that state university boards are not subject to the open-meetings act.

The school's student newspaper, the Oakland Post, sued the board in March after student journalists were not informed about or allowed into a January board meeting in which trustees discussed state budget cuts.

Rebecca Wyatt, editor in chief of the newspaper, said a newspaper staff member discovered the meeting by spotting university board members on campus when there was no regular meeting scheduled.

Wyatt said the staffer followed the board members to a conference room but was told the meeting was a private session. The newspaper later discovered the board was discussing budget cuts, Wyatt said.

"It goes against everything we believe," Wyatt said. "Democracy dies behind closed doors. That's what's happening here."

The Oakland Post is rallying support from other media organizations to appeal the decision, but Wyatt said she was unsure whether the newspaper will continue the fight.

The university, however, maintains that there is nothing to fight for.

"Absolutely no business at the university is conducted in private," Ted Montgomery, a university spokesman, said.

"We're pleased that Judge Kuhn's decision confirmed what has been our position all along."

Montgomery said the closed meeting was purely informational and no decisions were made.

He said he could not comment on why board members wanted to keep the meeting private.

Kuhn cited a 1999 Michigan Supreme Court decision in the court's ruling.

In the 1999 case, the supreme court ruled that the open-meetings act did not apply to Michigan State University's board of trustees when it met to discuss the school's search for a new president because public access to the meetings could hamper the school's ability to attract the best candidates.

The supreme court also cited a state constitutional provision that university boards have autonomy to govern the internal affairs of the school.

Referring to the 1999 decision, Kuhn wrote that a meeting about state budget cuts qualified as internal affairs and thus was exempt from the open-meetings act.

Herschel Fink, attorney for the Oakland Post, said Kuhn's interpretation of the 1999 supreme court decision was overly broad.

"He took a very expansive view of a very narrow decision," Fink said. "The university is saying they have a constitutional right to ignore the open-meetings act. That's wrong."

But with support pouring in from other state media organizations, Fink remains optimistic.

"This is just one county judge," Fink said. "It's a bad precedent to set, but it only affects this small university."

The newspaper will decide this week whether to appeal.

Georgia students sue school over suspension for online comments

GEORGIA – Two high school seniors and their fathers have sued the Gwinnett County School District, claiming officials violated the students' First Amendment rights by suspending the students for comments they posted on an off-campus Web site.

According to the lawsuit filed Aug. 22 in U.S. District Court in Atlanta, Brookwood High School students Lloyd "L.E." Goldsmith Jr. and Edward Alexander Morgan were suspended March 7 after administrators said their comments – posted on another student's Web site – threatened a Brookwood High School teacher.

The Web site, used by students and others to vent frustrations about the teacher, included some hypothetical scenarios which visualized some fictional acts, but did not contain any direct threats or expressions of any intent to commit any violent acts, the lawsuit said.

The lawsuit, filed by the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia and two Decatur, Ga., attorneys, does not identify the teacher.

The Gwinnett County School District, Superintendent J. Alvin Wilbanks and Brookwood High School Principal Jane Stegall are named as defendants.

Victoria Sweeny, the attorney for the Gwinnett County School District, said Goldsmith and Morgan were among the approximately 25 students who posted comments on the site.

Citing court documents, Sweeny said Goldsmith, using the name "Twitchy," posted on the site, "Filthy [expletive] gotta die!," referring to the teacher. Goldsmith also described a fictional assault in which a janitor rammed a mop through the teacher's head so that a wig could be sold to headhunters, Sweeny said.

Morgan, who used the pseudonym "AngryStudent," posted that he wanted to impale the teacher with a fence post, Sweeny said.

Morgan reportedly later retracted the comments, saying they only were meant as a joke.

The lawsuit said an unidentified student reported the Web site to a teacher in March. School officials suspended Goldsmith for more than seven months. Morgan was suspended for 10 days and required to perform 20 hours of community service.

Administrators said the comments violated the district's policies, including one that prohibits "any expression (oral, written, or gesture) which could have the effect of undermining the authority of the school employee including posting on or off campus Internet 'bit lists' or other writings of a threatening or provoking nature."

On April 17, the district said Goldsmith could return to school and required him to perform 40 hours of community service.

The lawsuit asks that the district expunge all references to the students' discipline and suspensions from their records. It also seeks undisclosed compensatory and punitive damages, and to declare provisions in the Gwinnett County School System student conduct code unconstitutionally vague and overbroad.

Rosenzveig said the district's actions violated the students' First Amendment rights.

"Even if the school board doesn't like [the students'] opinions it doesn't mean they can't have them," Rosenzveig said.

The first hearing in the case is set for early November.

more money for schools because it will affect the rest of her college experience.

"I'm going to be here for three more years, and I'm not thrilled about my tuition going up every year," Learned said.

Students at Pack the Library said they felt the letter writing campaign gives them a chance to do more about the budget cuts and tuition increases besides just complaining about it.

For students who were unaware of the issue at hand, or of its effect, events like this can teach them more about the issue and get them involved.

"Something like this educates students, gets them thinking about issues that are important to them," Bridge, senior in political science, said. "Events like this are going to educate them about the process and about the issues. It's going to get them involved in making a difference."

Attending events like Pack the Library show representatives that students do care about the issue and are willing to do something about it. Student Body President John O'Hara said it is important for students to let the legislators know of their concern.

"This is a time for students to show or convince their legislators of the need for higher education. With the recent tuition increase, there's not a better time for students to express their concern and to convince their legislators to invest in higher education," O'Hara said.

Reitz said he agrees about the importance of such events, but feels that students should do more if they really want to see change.

"I think we need to get their attention and let these folks know what needs to happen," Reitz said. "Students need to get their parents and have an eyeball-to-eyeball discussion with their legislators."

Lauren Goehring, and you haven't witnessed true athletic prowess until you've seen her slam home a kill.

Then there is junior transfer Valeria Hejjas.

This rookie phenom has lit up the Big 12 so far this season despite having been in The United States only since early August.

The Jensen twins, Cari and Kris, also have proven to be true senior leaders.

Cari sits eighth in the K-State record books with 2,873 career attacks, while having just moved into 10th in all time kills with 1,076.

And I'd be a fool if I left out the contributions of juniors Gabby Guerre and Lisa Martin.

Guerre, a first-team All-Big 12 selection a year ago, is moving her way up the career assist charts at K-State.

With an even 1,100 assists this season, Guerre sits third in Wildcat history with 3,261 in her three-year career.

Last year, the Cats made it to the second round of the NCAA Tournament before suffering a 1-3 loss to then 11th-ranked Washington State.

This year, K-State has positioned itself for a chance to be a host team and will look to improve on its finish last season.

And I'm sure they'd appreciate seeing Ahearn filled to the brim with students shaking the rickety old bleachers, giving the stadium the same atmosphere old school Wildcat fans can appreciate.

Ahearn used to host men's basketball games, if you were clueless, and was where future NBA stars Mitch Richmond and Rolando Blackman honed their craft.

I never went to a game there, but I've heard stories about how deafening it could get with 11,000 fans rocking the place.

Even Coach Suzie Fritz knows of Ahearn's storied history.

"The girls get some adrenaline going in front of their own crowd and we have some history and tradition here and a reputation to uphold," Fritz said.

So come out to the game and make a habit of showing everybody how we do it here in Middle America.

Lets get Ahearn rocking and let the PA announcer lead you in a call that will let opponents know whose house it is:

educate administrations through the press."

He said it would be foolish to claim the service isn't a resource for education.

"I believe high schools who block RateMyTeachers from their school computers are doing their students a great disservice and imposing on their right to free speech," said John Swapcienski of ratemyprofessors.com and co-founder of ratemyteachers.com. "There is no age requirement to the First Amendment."

Jeffrey Pickering, associate professor in the Department of Political Science at K-State, is listed on the Web site.

"I think it's just an institutionalization of the word-of-mouth practice that already existed," Pickering said.

Provost James Coffman echoed the sentiment.

"I think it stands a greater chance of misleading people than it does of helping them," Coffman said.

He said K-state had not taken actions to ban it, nor did it plan to in the future, but he said he does not support the site.

address issues in a more quickly, effective and efficient standpoint," Stoddard said.

Gary Olds and other renters opposed the ordinance because they didn't want to be fined for their tenants' violations.

Brad Everett, city commissioner, said he believed whoever was responsible for the violation should be held accountable.

A survey of how businesses were satisfied was included in the presentation and concluded that businesses were less than 50 percent satisfied with what the business improvement service fee accomplishes.

City commissioners voiced their concern with the low percentage and challenged the director of downtown Manhattan, Lisa Rockley, to get a 70-to-75 percent approval rating.

A large group of Manhattan families came to the meeting to show their support of Mayor Taussig's proclamation of National Marriage Protection Week in October. After a standing ovation, the group left.

Bush signs ban on type of abortion

By Jennifer Leven
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – President Bush signed legislation Wednesday banning a certain type of abortion, handing the disputed procedure's opponents a long-sought victory even as a federal judge at least partially blocked the new law from taking effect.

Bush

"For years, a terrible form of violence has been directed against children who are inches from birth while the law looked the other way," Bush said as he signed the ban on a procedure called partial-birth abortion by its critics.

"Today, at last, the American people and our government have confronted the violence and come to the defense of the innocent child."

The White House staged the ceremony, before about 400 cheering lawmakers and abortion opponents, at a federal building named for former President Ronald Reagan, a strong supporter of anti-abortion groups.

Kansas reports no partial-birth abortions since 1999

The ban on partial-birth abortion recently signed by President Bush will not limit choices available to Kansas women, and it is not expected to affect the number of reported abortions in the state.

The state of Kansas already has passed its own legislation prohibiting partial-birth abortion.

According to a 2002 report compiled by Kansas Department of Health and Environment, no partial-birth abortions were reported in Kansas between October 1999 and December 2002.

Greg Crawford of the Center for Health and Environmental Statistics said annual reports on abortions in Kansas are based on information submitted by physicians, hospitals and ambulatory surgical centers.

State statues require those institutions to report all intentional pregnancy terminations.

"No partial birth procedures were reported (in Kansas) in 2002 – the third year in a row," Crawford said.

Crawford said that the 2003 report will be released in March 2004.

A 10-year-old Manhattan boy who had been missing since Tuesday evening was found Wednesday afternoon in Oklahoma City.

McBride

Kendal Jamal McBride, 2925 Hickory Court, was reported missing when he didn't return home after his neighborhood paper route. The Riley County Police Department responded at 6:05 p.m., Lt. Kurt Moldrup said.

At 1:15 p.m. Wednesday, McBride was found by the Oklahoma City Police Department.

"The father was here at the time, and he was, of course, really excited," Moldrup said.

Moldrup said McBride told police he had been chased by a dog while delivering papers and then crawled into an unoccupied Kenworthy semi-trailer truck for safety.

The location of the truck at the time McBride crawled in was not known.

After eating some of the driver's lunch, McBride told police he crawled into the sleeping cab and fell asleep.

The driver, identified as Manhattan resident Kenneth Abernathy, began driving the truck, however at what time is not known, Moldrup said.

Abernathy stopped at a truck stop in Oklahoma City, where he noticed his lunch was half-eaten and began searching his truck further, which led to his Social workers and psychologists were on hand Wednesday at Marlatt Elementary School as students learned of their classmate's disappearance.

Kendal Jamal McBride, a fifth-grader in Sue Carpenter's class, later was found Wednesday afternoon after being reported missing Tuesday evening.

Sturr said she also had received many calls from parents.

"The parents' concerns are for the family," she said.

The students, Sturr said, had a relatively normal school day, which is always the goal in a crisis situation.

Fort Riley military officials release identity of 11th area soldier killed in Iraq

Improvised explosion device weapon claims soldiers life during Operation Iraqi Freedom

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Military officials have identified the 11th Fort Riley soldier to die during Operation Iraqi Freedom.

Second Lt. Todd Bryant, 23, was killed Friday by an improvised explosive device, according to a Fort Riley press release.

Bryant's information was not released earlier because his next of kin, including his wife, parents and siblings, had to be notified.

Bryant is the second officer from Fort Riley to die in Iraq, deputy media relations officer Christie Vanover said. Lt. Jonathan Rozier was killed July 19.

An improvised explosive device is a general term given to any device that is not a military-manufactured weapon.

Bryant was in Company C, 1st Battallion, 34th Armor, 1st Brigade, 1st Infantry Division. He was assigned to the unit as a Tank Platoon Leader.

Bryant's and the other 10 Fort Riley soldiers' deaths are still under investigation, Vanover said.

HOW TO

Avoid dry skin in winter

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the frigid temperatures sweep across the area, Jack Frost can do a number on skin.

According to the American Academy of Dermatology, in an effort to keep warm, Americans are doing serious damage to their skin that could be fixed with a few changes to their skin care routine.

Winter skin is a condition caused by a drop in humidity, a source of moisture for the skin. Experts say that when we wash our skin we also are losing moisture.

SHOWERS

The AAD recommends taking showers in lukewarm water. Hot water tends to remove natural oils from the skin. They also recommend limiting showers to five to 10 minutes in length.

SOAP

Try using a milder soap that is fragrance-free.

There are a lot of soaps today that can be good for your skin in the winter because they contain moisturizing agents.

LOTIONS

Covering your skin in lotion is a good thing, too. However, the AAD said lotion is best applied within three minutes of stepping out of the tub. The lotion will help trap the water in the upper layers of the skin and decrease dryness and itching.

Man pleads guilty to strangling record 48 women

Plea bargain spares him from execution

By Gene Johnson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE – Uttering the word "guilty" 48 times with chilling calm, Gary Leon Ridgway admitted Wednesday he is the Green River Killer and confessed to strangling four dozen women over two decades – "so many women I have a hard time keeping them straight."

"Choking is what I did and I was pretty good at it," the 54-year-old former truck-factory employee said in papers submitted as part of his plea bargain.

Ridgway, a short figure with glasses, thinning hair and a sandy mustache, pleaded guilty to more murders than any other serial killer in U.S. history.

He struck a plea bargain that will spare him from execution for those killings and bring life in prison without parole for one of the most baffling and disturbing serial killer cases the nation has ever seen.

For a half-hour, he listened in court with an utter lack of expression as his own accounting of how he picked up each victim and where he dumped the body was read aloud. In the most matter-of-fact way, he confirmed the details, responding "yes" over and over in a clear but subdued voice.

Gary Ridgeway, second from right, pleads guilty to 48 counts of aggravated first degree murder in front of Judge Richard A. Jones Wednesday in Seattle. He stands between his attorneys Anthony Savage, right, and Mark Prothero, as prosecutor Jeffrey B. Baird, left, listens.

"I wanted to kill as many women as I thought were prostitutes as I possibly could," he said in a statement that was read aloud in court by a prosecutor and opened an extraordinary window on the twisted mind of a serial killer. He also said: "I killed so many women I have a hard time keeping them straight."

He said he left some bodies in "clusters" and enjoyed driving by the sites afterward, thinking about what he had done. He said he sometimes stopped to have sex with the bodies.

Victims' relatives wept quietly in the courtroom.

"It was hard to sit there and see him not show any feeling and not show any remorse," said Kathy Mills, whose daughter Opal was 16 when she vanished in 1982. Opal's body was found in the Green River three days later.

Ridgway's lawyers said he was, in fact, sorry and will express that to the families at the sentencing, which will be held within six months. Defense attorney Tony Savage said Ridgway's emotions came "in private, in emotional ways, in tears and in words. ... He feels terrible remorse."

"The Green River nightmare is over," King County Prosecutor Norm Maleng said after the proceeding.

But Sheriff Dave Reichert – one of the first investigators on the case as a young detective – said that the investigation continues and that charges in more cases were possible. Under the plea bargain, Ridgway is not protected from the death penalty in other jurisdictions. He has not been charged elsewhere, but admitted dumping victims outside the county and in Oregon.

Other serial killers have bragged of murdering many dozens of victims, but Ridgway's plea agreement, signed June 13, puts more murders on his record than any other serial killer in U.S. history.

John Wayne Gacy, who preyed on men and boys in Chicago in the 1970s, was convicted of killing 33 people. Ted Bundy, whose killing started in Washington state, confessed to killing more than 30 women and girls but was convicted of murdering only three before he was executed.

2 suspects wanted in Shop Quik robbery

Suspects flee on foot with money

By Lindsey Bauman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two suspects are wanted in a case of aggravated robbery of a Shop Quik at 2028 Tuttle Creek Blvd.

The incident happened at about 6:30 p.m. Tuesday.

"Two subjects came into the store, one was brandishing a handgun and was demanding money," Riley County Police Lt. Kurt Moldrup said.

The clerk, James Hartigan, 56 Chad Place, was on duty at the time of the robbery.

He described the first suspect as a black male in his mid- to-late teens between the height of 5'7" and 5'11", wearing a heavy coat and ski mask.

The second suspect is described as being of an unknown race or sex and approximately 5'5" tall.

He was wearing a blue or black hooded coat and a ski mask. Both suspect fled from the scene on foot with an undisclosed amount of money.

Hartigan was not injured during the incident.

Aggieville Campus Edge Project proposes parking garage

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Plenty of drinking establishments, restaurants galore.

What's wrong with Aggieville?

A group of business owners in Aggieville believe it is the parking problem. Thus, the business owners and K-State officials have teamed up to propose a solution to the problem.

The solution, dubbed the Aggieville Campus Edge Project, has yet to be approved. Jeff Levin, owner of Varney's Book Store in Aggieville, said the surveying of the master plan will cost an estimated $55,000, and it is unknown how much the plan will cost.

"We requested funding for the study and are waiting for approval. Most money is coming from private owners. The city pledged $5,000 if the state approves the grant. KSU will give $5,000 and another $5,000 from another source," Levin said.

The project was started in July, when the business owners realized they hadn't done any renovations on the master plan for about 15 years, Levin said.

Levin said the need for parking had to be vertically, because they could not make Aggieville any larger.

He said the proposed parking garage will work for high and low density housing and there will be properties on the lower level, so that it is not completely parking facilities.

"There are competing pressures, other shopping districts and the challenges of parking and traffic in Aggieville made it tougher to compete with these businesses," Levin said.

Levin said the project is only in the exploration stage, and nothing will be final until later this month, after word granting or refusing the request for a grant to fund the project.

Bob Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, said the plan hasn't been reviewed for at least a month.

"I met with the Manhattan Business Association about a month ago and we took a look at the planned development and student housing possibilities. We'd like to work with anyone who has ideas of putting up a parking garage and will help financially. The need for K-State and the community is equally important, but the plan wasn't too specific at the last meeting," Krause said.

Krause said the benefits of the plan would be endless.

"A parking garage would serve us well because there are so many events at McCain and the busy traffic in Aggieville," Krause said. "Anytime there is student housing available in the private sector, it will benefit our students."

Missing child incident elicits strong response

When a 10-year-old boy was reported missing Tuesday, it was nice to see a quick response.

The Riley County Police Department and the Manhattan community combined efforts to respond immediately in a citywide search.

RCPD staff members and police officers went door-to-door on Wednesday to let residents know Kendal Jamal McBride was missing and to ask if they had seen him.

RCPD also searched in bushes and around the exteriors of houses.

Community members searched the area for many hours as well and put up flyers around town.

Fortunately, McBride was found less than 24 hours after he was reported missing. The hours spent searching resulted in a positive outcome, unlike many cases of missing children.

These actions help Manhattan and Riley County residents feel more secure knowing our community will respond promptly in dangerous situations.

Marriage proclamation highlights need to keep religion out of politics

President Bush's Marriage Protection Week and Mayor Mark Taussig's subsequent resolution of approval has been a major source of argument in this city over the last few weeks.

The proclamation is not only an attack on the civil rights of homosexuals, but also those of single parents, divorcees, common-law spouses and cohabiting couples.

Illustrations by Jeff Yeung | COLLEGIAN

SCOTT SEEL

However, these issues have been beaten to death and only serve to infuriate people with divisive rhetoric.

What is being overlooked in all of this is the blatant disregard for the structure of our government.

Last night, the Manhattan Republican Assembly, led by Gary Olds, had a rally in support of the proclamation despite the fact that city officials are supposed to be apolitical.

During the open-comment portion of the meeting, one of the members spoke in support of Taussig and asked everyone in the room who agreed with him to stand and show their support.

About 100 people, seemingly all associated with this group in some way, stood.

Following this, rather than reciprocating the respect showed to them by listening to the opposing opinions of others, they all walked out of the meeting.

Then, in the hallway of the courthouse, they began to pray, quote scripture and sing hymns.

As a Presbyterian, I am not at all offended by Christianity, but I am offended by any blatant and organized show of any religion in a government building.

To the best of my knowlege, this rally was not publicized in any way that might allow people with opposing views to attend and speak their mind. Word was spread by an e-mail campaign to members of the group and local churches.

As a result of these actions, any stance that Taussig has taken to claim this is not a religious issue is now undermined.

Taussig is not a hateful man. I have worked with him as a reporter, and he is a very nice man who just wants to do what he believes to be the right thing. However, he has become a bit overzealous.

Many people on both sides believe this is a local issue, but, in fact, the opposite is true.

This is a federal issue, and Taussig's proclamation, almost word for word, came from a Christian organization via the White House.

In fact, there is a Constitutional amendment on the floor of the Kansas House of Representatives which, if passed and ratified, would define marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

This amendment was co-sponsored by Manhattan's Congressional representative, Jim Ryun.

Our Constitution is designed to list positive rights, ones that say citizens have a right to do such and such, or the government does not have the right to do such and such.

For instance, everyone has the right to free speech.

An amendment like this would establish what is known as a negative right, one that prohibits a certain type of behavior.

Only one such amendment exists, the 18th, which established prohibition, and it also is the only amendment to ever be nullified.

Religious conflicts with homosexuality are relevant to this discussion.

Even if the religious argument is an accurate one, the fact remains that Capitol Hill, the White House and City Hall are not the places to fight this battle.

You have every right to believe homosexuals are sinners, but your right to that belief does not, under any circumstances, extend to legislating that belief upon others.

Columnist prefers squirrels over politics

GRANT REICHERT

From the e-mail bag:

How in the world did you get a column? After reading your previous columns, I thought about suggesting that you immediately check into the nearest asylum, except I feared for the safety of the other inmates.

Instead, I suggest you collect all the previous copies of your work, give them to a blind, non-English-speaking child so he can destroy them, and then take a vow of illiteracy.

It was once said a thous[illegible]nonkeys on a thousand typewriters could write all of Shakespeare's work, given enough time. THOSE MONKEYS DESERVE YOUR JOB!!!

Are you coming home for Thanksgiving?

Love, Mom and Dad

That's right, the guy in high school voted most likely to get his head stuck in some kind of heavy machinery has his own column.

How did this happen, you ask? I'll tell you – "Affirmative Action for Boneheads."

My years of dedicated idiocy finally have paid off. I had to eat paint chip after paint chip to make myself unqualified enough to qualify, but it definitely was worth the lack of effort.

Now that I've got the job, though, I better get to work – here at the Collegian, we don't rest on our laurels.

Hell, we don't even know what laurels are.

To start, I have decided to use my first column to write a serious, in-depth investigative piece on the reconstruction in Iraq. First step: dictionary.

Investigative (adj.): 1. of, or relating to, investigation

Whoa, my brain hurts. I better lie down for a few minutes. That new fact is buzzing around in my head like a fly in an empty auditorium.

Ugh, the war in Iraq is going to have to wait. Tell Bush not to move a muscle, and whatever he does, don't let the United Nations anywhere near the Middle East. Talk about your U.N. wanted houseguests – those guys are still in Bosnia after how many years?

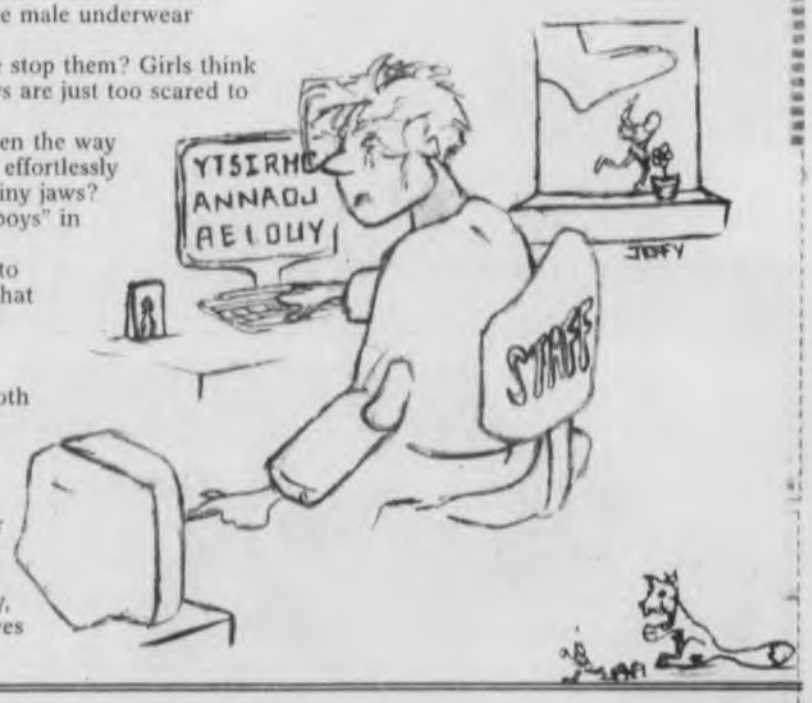
I guess I'll pick a new topic, one just as grave and pressing.

Who else hates squirrels?

They strut around like they own the place and defecate everywhere like the little feces factories they are, and yet no one stops them. They've even erected a huge squirrel fort down by the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. Check it out – it's even scarier than plus-size male underwear models.

Why does no one stop them? Girls think they're cute and guys are just too scared to go near them.

Have you ever seen the way those little squirrels effortlessly crack nuts in their tiny jaws? That could be the "boys" in there!



If you do decide to muster up some of that caveman machismo and try to down a roaring – well, squeaking – mammoth squirrel beast, I suggest keeping a safe distance and using projectiles.

Always remember to cover the jewels when they look at you with their beady, squirrelly squirrel eyes and you hear that freaky violin music start to play, because another episode of "When Small Furry Mammals Go for the Groin" is about ready to be filmed.

Also, make sure you get some insurance, so if you have the Nutcracker Suite performed on you by Chip and Dale, at least you'll have some good news. You'll have saved a bunch of money with Geico.

Well, I'm done. Where's that blind, non-English speaking kid?

Honor system needs replacing

Editor,

Once again, I am shocked to read our honor system is not doing the job it should be. In Sarah Rice's article on Monday, "Honor system evolves to current form," we hear from Phil Anderson, who seems to really be reaching for an explanation into the sociology class incident.

I had to laugh when I read about our "fairly new system," which started in fall 1994, according to the article and Anderson's statement.

Anderson said, "We are learning a lot ... you have to make mistakes to learn. There are some things we could have done different to make it faster and ease the stress on those involved."

Is anyone buying this? The honor system council is still learning from their mistakes after nine years? For almost a decade now, we have been trying to work the bugs out of a broken system, and now we are incorporating this flawed system into the graduate school?

I see many things that are totally wrong with our current system.

The second chance with an XF recorded on your transcript is not a second chance, but simply allows you to continue to pour money into your education at K-State with no chance at getting a job after graduating with your "scarlet letter" transcript.

Our current system has no appeal process, and judgment seems to be made by a biased council. Yes, it's a mix of faculty and students, but what student is going to disagree with a professor or dean from his or her own college?

I personally don't have quite the compassion that Anderson seems to portray. I tend to lean more toward the beliefs of many universities. If you are found guilty of academic fraud, you are expelled.

I think the system in place at the University of Virginia would be a great one to emulate. There are going to be cases that arise which would not warrant expulsion, and I also could see a need for an academic integrity course for very minor violations.

I think the honor system at Virginia is unbiased and fair. It has withstood 161 years with results of only a 7 percent cheating rate, as opposed to the national average of 40 percent.

I agree with Anderson when he said students see more black and white and faculty see shades of gray. Students see a cheater or a mistaken accusation.

Cheating degrades our education system. It devalues the degrees we earn. It must be dealt with in a stern but fair way. Our current system doesn't seem to do this, and the administrators of our system are now calling academic fraud a student mistake.

A mistake, by definition, is a misunderstanding or an error in judgment caused by insufficient knowledge. Academic fraud – cheating – is no mistake.

'Passion' contains fictitious elements

Editor,

I am writing this letter in response to several comments I have read in the Campus Fourum over the past few days that have greatly disturbed me. These comments relate to Mel Gibson's new film, titled "The Passion of Christ."

Legitimate concerns broached by the Anti-Defamation League and other organizations, including the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, have resulted in a shocking outpouring of anti-Semitism.

The Anti-Defamation League and other organizations are not advocating censorship of the film by any means. Instead, they are asking for sensitivity and respect to be shown to the dangerous repercussions of a conspiracy-oriented, historically false distortion of the Jewish people.

Throughout history, Passion dramatizations have led to violence and hatred against the Jews. The age-old deicide charge has led to the deaths of countless Jews over time. Jewish people have a right to be concerned if these ideas are resurfacing into mainstream culture.

The Catholic Church, hardly a liberal organization, has renounced the deicide charge against the Jewish people and all forms of anti-Semitism in the actions of the Second Vatican Council.

Personally, I would not consider these actions to be "errors and liberal reforms," but steps to securing a lasting peace and friendship between these two closely-related religions.

"The Passion of Christ" has several disturbing inaccuracies.

There are several fictitious non-scriptural elements included in the film viewed by critics, including the high priest's control of Pontius Pilate, Jews paying "blood money" for the crucifixion and Jesus' cross constructed in the Temple courtyard at the direction of Jewish religious officials.

The story of the Passion can be told without maligning the Jewish people.

Gibson has a responsibility to make a movie that does not contribute further to a legacy of historically false information.

Gibson certainly does not get a free pass at this. If he puts scenes into his movie that are not in the Gospels and contradict Jewish historical texts, he can and should be criticized.

Homecoming benefits Jardine children

Editor,

Please allow me the opportunity to thank the students, staff and alumni of K-State who participated in and attended the events throughout homecoming week.

As participants in the Residence Hall Division, the Jardine Terrace Apartment Complex sported teams for almost all the events, which included children from our community.

Many traditional students forget the K-State campus is home to people of all ages and can, at times, behave in a manner best suited to a barroom rather than a classroom, so it often is with concern that we include our children in events like homecoming.

This year we were overwhelmed with the support offered to the residents of our community, including our children, and not once did our concern meet with cause.

The residents in our community were met with cheers of encouragement and pats on the back as they completed the Memory Walk and Run, Crazy Cat Kickoff and the homecoming parade.

Many of the participants from the Jardine complex were international students, who only temporarily call Manhattan and K-State home, and it was heartwarming to see them embraced in the "K-State way."

As a result of your support, we look forward to participating in future campus events, and will do so with pride, confident we will be welcome.

Coffee talk

Café invokes discussion, personal memories

OKSANA BOYKO
GUEST COLUMN

Strong black coffee made bitter by broken relationships. A French soda bubbling with flirtation. Hot green tea steaming nostalgia and loneliness.

In a coffee shop, drinks and emotions blend together as people sitting at round tables sip and smile, think, chat, remember, or try to forget.

It's 7 p.m. on a Monday, and I am sitting at Java Espresso & Bakery with my book open and my eyes closed. A drained tea bag at the bottom of my cup looks exhausted – like my soul. Empty sugar packets scattered around the table are like my memories, with a slight aftertaste of sweetness.

The soft specks of light on the newly painted walls remind me that four years ago I was sitting in a similar coffee shop with my book closed and my eyes drawn to the multiple shades of brown in his eyes.

When I miss my husband so desperately, I come to Java. It has always made me think of the place where we first met, but after Java's walls assumed the color of vanilla cookies the resemblance became even more striking. I sit here, drink hot green tea and lose myself in yellow memories of past happiness.

A young woman at the table next to mine doesn't like yellow.

She and her friend drink black coffee and discuss her failed relationship with a guy she was going to marry. Bitterness in her voice adds to the strong smell of the coffee, and I can almost feel sour, burning streams flow inside of her as she nervously sips her steaming brew.

"I don't like this color," she says, suddenly looking around.

"It's so...," she tries to find the right word. "It is so... artificial."

Two tables away a young couple is on their first date. They are unaware of my look following them, and they don't notice the change in Java's interior.

They drink their French sodas and talk about mutual friends. He jokes – she smiles. She tells – he listens intently. It seems they both try to drink slowly, and the whipped cream on the top of their pink drinks starts sinking downward.

Twenty minutes later, when I walk toward the exit, the young couple is still sitting there with their glasses half full. The disappointed young woman and her friend already have left, and there is a man drinking water with lemon at their table.

He has his book with him, but his eyes are directed above it, to a table with three giggling girls. One of the girls stands up and moves toward the counter. He takes his place in a line just behind her, and casually asks her about the Java's newly painted walls.

"Cool color, huh?"

The future in sports comes tonight

JOEL REICHENBERGER

Tonight might be a very important night in the world of K-State basketball.

The K-State men play their first exhibition game of the season, against EA Sports.

The unranked men playing their first exhibition game is a can't-miss event?

Yes, it is.

EA Sports is a team stocked with former college and NBA talent, so don't be surprised if the Cats lose.

But don't be surprised if the fans leave with their jaws dragging behind them, either. For the first time, K-State fans will see the future.

Dez Willingham, Cartier Martin, Lance Harris and Tyler Hughes will define this program for the next four years, and they will define Coach Jim Wooldridge's tenure in Manhattan.

Tonight is your first chance to see them.

I've written before about the quality of these freshmen, but the more I listen to the players and coaches who know them best, the more convinced I become.

Tim Ellis gave high praise to freshman forward Martin.

"Cartier, for a freshman, he's real good," Ellis said. "If you didn't know him, you'd think he was a junior or something, the way he plays."

Wooldridge also acknowledged Willingham's progress at point guard.

"He is one of the players that has shown drastic improvement from the first week of practice to where we are today," he said. "Dez has the ability to make players better on the floor, which is a sign of a good player. He's showing more and more of those capabilities as we move through practice."

Martin plays above his age and Willingham drastically improves those around him?

That's what I like to hear. That's what people say about players that live up to hype, not about those who are disappointments.

Two weeks ago we saw Bill Snyder march his "Foundation" out on the field during the KU football game. Snyder credited those players for showing the heart, emotion, sweat and blood upon which the now-powerhouse football program was built.

They were the players who first beat North Texas to end one of the ugliest losing streaks in college football history. They were the ones who took the Big 8 by storm. They were the ones that began the annual tradition of roasting the Jayhawks and they took K-State to its second-ever bowl.

Willingham, Martin, Harris and the rest are Wooldridge's foundation. If Snyder had failed with his group, he'd have been flushed out of town like so many before. If Wooldridge fails, he might be gone, too.

But that won't happen. The game might not be pretty tonight, but it wasn't pretty when Snyder took over, either. It will be promising, because for the first time K-State fans will see the light at the end of the tunnel.

Wooldridge has succeeded here, and even though it isn't evident, it will be very soon.

Come see the foundation laid at 7 tonight.

K-State women open exhibition season with win

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fourteen K-State women stepped onto the Bramlage Coliseum hardwood Wednesday night for the basketball team's exhibition opener against Washburn.

They didn't disappoint.

The Wildcats put together a business-like effort in knocking off the Division-II Lady Blues 73-51 before a crowd of 8,433.

But what caught most of the fans' eyes were the newcomers – five freshman wearing royal purple for the first time, giving the Wildcats depth for the first time in years.

"I was real pleased that everyone got a little court time," Coach Deb Patterson said. "We got some nerves out by getting the younger players on the court."

One of those newcomers was 5-foot-5 guard Twiggy McIntyre, who played 19 minutes and scored 11 points – one of four Wildcats to score in the double-digits.

K-State's Big Three played about half as many minutes as they are used to and scored about what they averaged, but Coach Deb Patterson said she still expected more of her veterans after a 73-51 win over Washburn.

"We still need to get better," she said.

Senior Nicole Ohlde and juniors Kendra Wecker and Laurie Koehn played 24, 22 and 30 minutes, respectively. Ohlde led all scorers with 16 points and had two steals, two assists and one block.

Ohlde's four turnovers caught Patterson's attention.

"Post turnovers were just too high," she said. "You've just got to get better in every aspect of the game. We need to take care of the ball better and defend at a much higher level."

5th-ranked Cats roll over Iowa State, 3-0

By Wes Marfield

With the season slowly winding down, K-State coach Suzie Fritz wanted to make sure her team didn't become complacent against Iowa State.

Her team responded, sending the Cyclones packing with a resounding 3-0 victory Wednesday night.

"We said before the match that we wanted to have a sense of urgency – a competitive intuition early in the match so we didn't rely on someone else putting pressure on us before we started to play well," Fritz said. "We felt like we did that the last time we went to Iowa State and they took the first game from us. We didn't want that to happen again."

Her message must have sunk in, as the Cats came out strong in game one, taking a 30-18 decision from Iowa State. Senior Cari Jensen chipped in with six kills as K-State out-hit the Cyclones .436 to .175.

Men's basketball tip off tonight

7 new players kick off collegiate basketball career with game against EA Sports All-Stars

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State opens its men's basketball season at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum against the EA Sports All-Stars.

Unlike a regular season game, winning is not the most important thing, Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

Rather, the Cats hope to successfully integrate seven new players, including four highly touted freshman.

"We have this picture to clear up the best we can during the exhibition season," Wooldridge said. "In exhibition games we look to, one, win the game, and two, learn more about our team."

To learn more about his team, Wooldridge plans to flood the floor with numerous combinations of players and personalities. One of the goals is to discover who works well together.

Wooldridge is so dedicated to discovering where the chemistry lies, that a player in the starting line up means nothing. The first five players on the floor will be the first combination tested.

"I don't think it matters who we start," Wooldridge said. "Whoever starts, it's not a validation for the starting role for a year. It's just the combination we're going to look at first."

If Wooldridge chooses to test his most experienced players first, fans will see Frank Richards running the point, Jarrett Hart or Tim Ellis at the other guard spots, and Marques Hayden filling in down low.

Richards, who started at point last season, averaged 9.9 points per game and led the team in assists.

Hart and Ellis split time starting at shooting guard. Ellis seemed to have a slight edge shooting the ball, averaging 9.4 points per game to Hart's 7.5, but Hart had more rebounds and recorded more assists.

Hayden, a likely starter at forward, earned one start as a freshman and averaged seven points and only 18.7 minutes per game. This season he should see more minutes as both of last year's starting forwards graduated, and Hayden dumped 35 pounds in a rigorous off-season training program.

Even with an experienced trio of guards and a promising sophomore returning, the story of the game and the measure of the season will be the newcomers.

NFL | Widow of Carolina Panther sentenced to prison

The widow of NFL running back Fred Lane was sentenced to nearly eight years in prison Wednesday for shooting her husband to death three years ago as he walked in the front door.

Deidra Lane, who pleaded guilty in August to voluntary manslaughter, broke down in tears as the judge read the sentence.

Judge Timothy Patti gave her the maximum sentence of seven years and 11 months. He ruled the slaying was premeditated and deliberate, that Lane acted with malice, and that she shot her husband a second time after the first shot rendered him helpless. Those factors outweighed the alleged abuse, the judge said.

MLB | Marlins catcher to stand trial for rape

Florida Marlins catcher Ramon Castro was ordered Wednesday to stand trial on charges he raped a woman in his hotel room in August.

Castro, a 27-year-old married father of two, was arrested after the woman went to police with her story. He was charged with rape, involuntary deviate sexual intercourse, indecent assault, sexual assault and unlawful restraint.

CFB | More programs switching conferences

The Big East, stung by the impending departure of three key members to the Atlantic Coast Conference, responded Tuesday by luring five schools from Conference USA.

Louisville, Cincinnati and South Florida accepted invitations to join the Big East in all sports. DePaul and Marquette, which do not have football teams, will join the conference in all other sports. The five schools will begin play in the Big East in the 2005-06 academic year.

The Big East suffered a serious blow over the summer when Miami and Virginia Tech voted to leave and join the ACC after the current academic year ends. Boston College voted last month to leave for the ACC, but that move might not take place until 2006.

Anticipating the departure of several key members, Conference USA immediately announced the five schools that will replace those leaving for the Big East. Rice, Southern Methodist and Tulsa for Western Athletic Conference and Marshall and Central Florida of the Mid-American Conference will join Conference USA beginning in 2005.

MLB | American League announces Gold Gloves

Mike Hampton ended Braves teammate Greg Maddux's record 13-year Gold Glove winning streak as the National League's best fielding pitcher, and St. Louis Cardinals won four of nine awards for the second-straight Wednesday. Pitcher Jim Kaat holds the overall record with 16 Gold Gloves. Maddux has 10 as a Brave.

Hampton

Outfielder Jim Edmonds, third baseman Scott Rolen, shortstop Edgar Renteria and catcher Mike Matheny won Gold Gloves, as did Andruw Jones, Derrek Lee and Luis Castillo of the World Champion Florida Marlins, and Giants outfielder Jose Cruz, Jr. and Houston's Richard Hidalgo also were winners.

MLB | Mariners sign Martinez to one more year

Hoping to restructure their player payroll, the Colorado Rockies will listen to trade offers for All-Star first baseman Todd Helton and center fielder Preston Wilson, one of their best hitters last season.

Helton

Manager Clint Hurdle said Tuesday the Rockies are not shopping the two players but that they have to be prepared to make them available. Helton has batted .339 and averaged 36 homers in his first six seasons, and missed his second National League batting crown by percentage points.

Patterson said that although her expectations were high for her veterans, the goal was to give underclassmen time on the floor.

Wecker said the game exposed some of K-State's weaknesses, which will be a focus before Sunday's exhibition game against Basketball Travelers.

"We got a game underneath our belts," Wecker said. "I don't think any of us are satisfied with the way we played tonight. I think we had too many turnovers, and my play in particular wasn't at the level it should be, especially rebounding and on the defensive end.

"We're better than what we showed tonight, and we're going to work hard in practice the next couple of days to come out and play harder on Sunday."

Combining for 16-of-27 field goal attempts, the Big Three shot 60 percent from the field.

Defensively, they combined for three steals and kept the Lady Blues to 33 percent shooting.

If seeing the potential of the incoming class was a goal for the game, it was accomplished and, Ohlde said, versatility will soon be a characteristic of the team.

"Since we have 14 on our team now, it's good that we can throw different combinations out there and play different positions," she said.

Going beyond six deep, while a definite adjustment, will only benefit K-State – starters, veterans and reserves, Wecker said.

"I definitely think this will help us out in the long run," she said.

BASKETBALL | K-State defeats Washburn, 73-51

While McIntyre was expected to run the point and lead the Wildcat offense, most people didn't expect her to score. She responded by hitting 4-of-6 from the field, including 2-of-4 from beyond the three-point arc.

K-State took plenty of shots, hitting more than 45 percent of them for the game, including 9-of-9 from the free throw line.

The Wildcats jumped out to a 16-4 lead early before the Lady Blues came charging back. K-State went on another run to make it 30-11 with 5:01 remaining in the first half, but offensive miscues plagued the Cats.

They turned the ball over 18 times, many of which came late in the first half. Washburn pulled to within 35-23 at the break.

K-State and Washburn traded blow for blow early in the second half before the Cats went on a 9-0 run with three pointers by McIntyre, Claire Coggins and Laurie Koehn.

The Cats cruised through the final 8:23 to ice the win.

Brie Madden had eight points while Megan Mahoney pulled down 10 rebounds. Koehn finished with 12 points and was 4-of-8 from three-point range, while senior Player of the Year candidate Nicole Ohlde led K-State with 16 points and pulled down six rebounds.

But it was the freshmen that made the biggest impression. All five saw action, combining to log 53 minutes and score 17 points.

VOLLEYBALL | Cats take Cyclones in all 3 games

The second game was more of the same, as K-State won 30-16 with two more kills from Jensen and three from freshman Sandy Werner.

Game three, however, was Valeria Hejjas' show.

The junior racked up eight kills in the third contest, leading the Cats to a 30-17 victory and the win.

Hejjas said she felt like she had something to prove against Iowa State.

"I felt more confident," Hejjas said. "The last couple of days were not my best – I was a little bit down."

Giving credit to the Cyclones, Fritz said she thought her team did a good job keeping Iowa State in check after dropping the first game in a 3-1 win over them Oct. 22.

"They played very well in Ames against us – they served incredibly aggressive," Fritz said. "Tonight, our serve was very good and we were able to keep them out of system and on the run, so I thought we played very well on both sides of the ball – offensively and defensively."

The 3-0 victory also gave Fritz the chance to put in some players who don't see a lot of playing time, but have earned it in practice.

"Our starting six or seven are really good because they're getting significant pressure from six or seven on the other side of the net everyday," Fritz said.

The Cats will return to action Nov. 12, when they hit the road to face Missouri.

Men's team to begin its season tonight

"We just want to accomplish chemistry on our team – having everyone on the same page and making sure everybody fits in with each other," Ellis said.

The players seeing their first Division-I collegiate action will have high expectations to overcome. The recruiting class was gauged the nation's best by some, and fans will be eager to see the new team take the floor.

Wooldridge said he's ready to see the players wow the crowd, but cautions that his young players need to keep the rest of the team in mind.

"That's kind of what is expected from these guys – to come out and try to show what they are," Wooldridge said. "To a certain extent, that's good, but we want them to put more of a big picture together. Play well together, play in a better system of play – that's what we want to see."

No matter if the seven new players each put up 20 points, or if they stumble and barely scratch the scoreboard, Wooldridge said it will be a while until it's all ready.

When the game tips off, it's just another step on the way to building a team.

"We've come along way. We have light years to go," he said. "It's part of the glass half full. We've made progress, at the same time we have a lot of things to clean up and a lot of questions yet to be answered."

Tennis to conclude season this weekend

By Louie Novak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State tennis team concludes its fall season this weekend when it competes in the Thunderbirds Collegiate Tennis Invitational at Arizona State.

Some of the most competitive and highly-ranked women's singles and doubles players from around the country will be showcased in the annual invitational.

Schools participating this year along with K-State include Arizona State, California, Duke, Purdue, Rice and UNLV.

The format for the tournament will feature a main draw of 32 singles with consolation play for first-round losers, as well as a doubles/main consolation draw that will consist of 16 teams.

The Wildcats have had a two-week break to prepare for this weekend's tournament. The last time K-State was in action was when the team competed in the ITA Regionals.

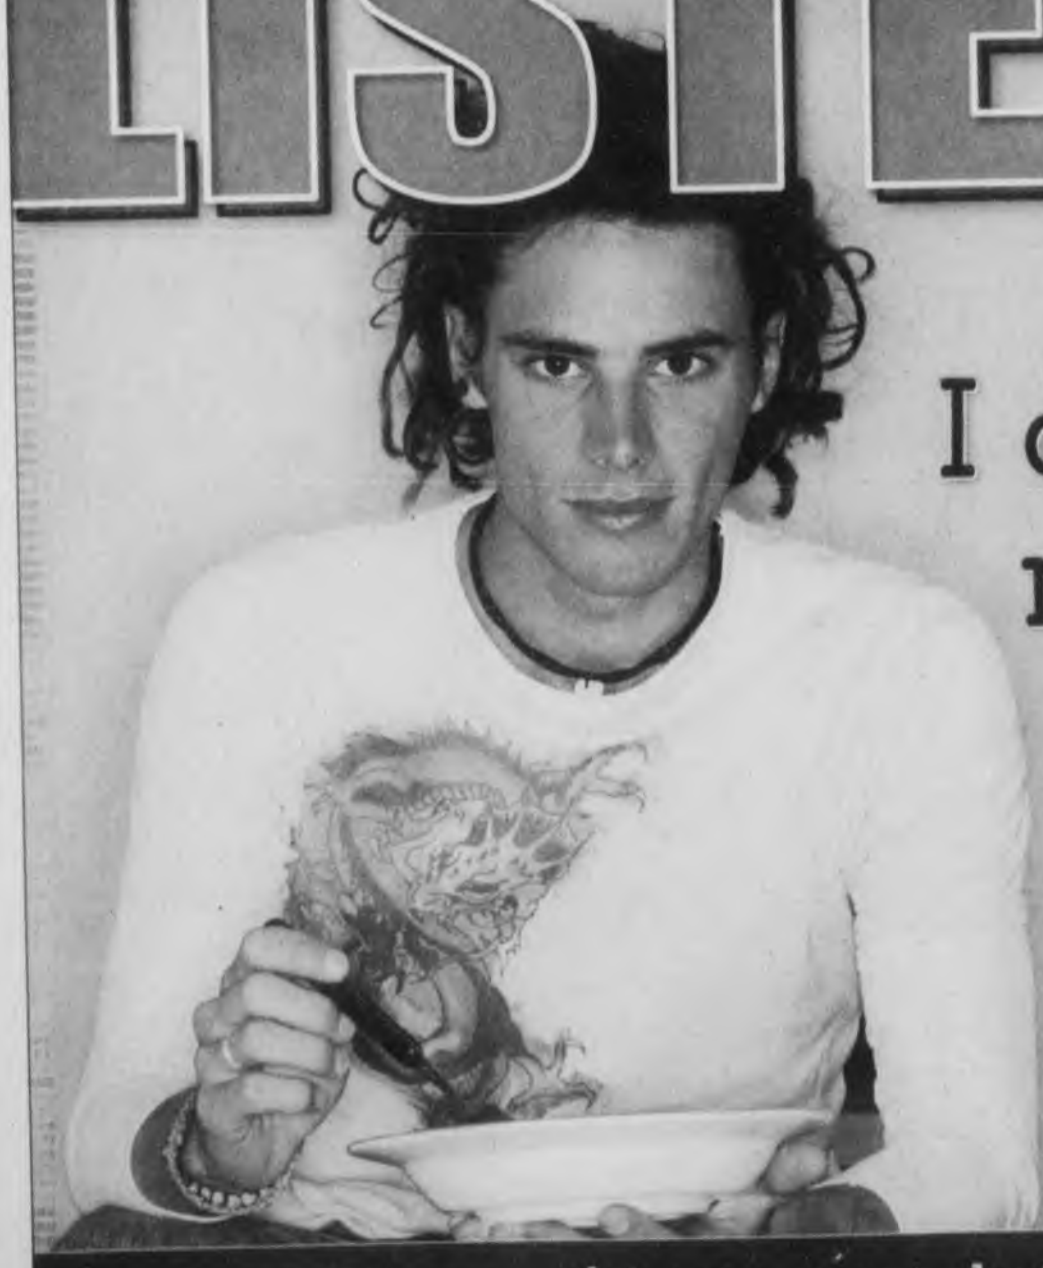
Coach Steve Bietau said the break was a much-needed one that allowed the team to work out some problems.

"There was some unfinished business when we left regionals," Bietau said. "Although there were some positive things we accomplished there, we left knowing there is still a lot of work that we need to do."

Bietau said the team's inconsistency is still an issue that continues to plague the Wildcats.

"There are spots where we simply didn't close out a match, and then times when we didn't play well at all," Bietau said. "We have used this time to watch video from the matches and have had each player realize their role on the team and see what they have to do to improve. We have had some good practices as well as some bad ones, but what counts is how we perform this weekend."

K-State senior Paulina Castillejos said the team's performance in regionals was disappointing, and added she was confident the squad would rebound.



"It is always hard to lose and is tough when things don't go your way," Castillejos said. "I have tried to talk to my teammates and push them to perform the way we know we can. Although they don't always like it, I feel it is important that as a senior I try to get them to understand what we need to do to be successful."

The Wildcats also have made some adjustments they hope will work out at the Invitational.

"We have switched doubles partners and believe the adjustments will be more successful in Arizona than at regionals," Castillejos said. "It has been a long semester and we have worked hard. Hopefully, we can end the season on a good note."

Faculty to speak on wind farm issue

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some are for it. Some are against it.

Either way, both sides will be educated on the wind farm issue that faces Riley County.

Riley County officials have asked two K-State faculty members to provide an educational program to present to county commissioners and residents in mid-January, said Alan Ladd, Riley County extension director.

"Our purpose is to provide some non-biased research based on information to commissioners, landowners and interested audience participants," Ladd said. "Our goal is to present disadvantages and advantages to wind farms."

The request comes after weeks of debate among county commissioners regarding a wind farm issue that was introduced over one year ago, when a California company – among others – began looking at Riley County land for the construction of a potential wind farm.

Commissioners voted last Thursday in favor of adopting a six-month moratorium on the wind farm issue, which Ladd said will provide time to educate commissioners and the public.

During that time, Ladd also said commissioners will be looking at zoning regulations with Monty Wedel, director of planning and development for the county.

Richard Nelson, director of Kansas Industrial Extension Services, was asked by the county to put together a program that will lay out issues concerning the wind farm, including environmental access, noise, and siting issues.

"It's really being put together for Riley County, but my intention is to take it and give it to other counties," Nelson said. "It's not strictly for Riley County."

Nelson said his research will attempt to answer common questions residents and commissioners have been asking.

"They'll become more educated on the energy picture in Kansas and the U.S. in general," Nelson said.

"We have a great resource and we want to potentially take advantage of this. We want to do this in a sustainable, practical and prudent matter."

Roger McEowen, associate professor of agricultural economics, will examine the legal aspects of the wind farm issue – primarily contracts between land owners and companies.

"There's a lot of potential here to be a good cash crop for land owners if the leases are directed properly," McEowen said.

McEowen said he has presented a similar educational program in April for state officials.

"It's always good to take pause and get up to speed on what the concerns might be and how to build a fair agreement with these companies," McEowen said.

President declares state of emergency in Sri Lanka

By Shimale Senanayake
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka – Sri Lanka's crisis deepened Wednesday as the president declared a state of emergency, giving her sweeping powers, and her rival met with President Bush and said the power grab would not derail efforts to end 20 years of civil war.

Aides insisted President Chandrika Kumaratunga wouldn't resume fighting the Tamil Tiger rebels, a conflict that is at the root of her feud with Prime Minister Ranil Wickremesinghe. Kumaratunga believes the prime minister has been too soft on the rebels.

After meeting Bush Wednesday in Washington, Wickremesinghe downplayed the developments in Sri Lanka, a country off of the southern coast of India.

"This is part of Sri Lankan politics," he said. "For 25 years we have had these ups and downs."

He added that he had the support of a majority of Parliament and that he would get the peace process back on track.

"When I go back I will sort it out," he said.

Ahead of the meeting, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said: "The United States strongly supports the peace process and strong democratic institutions in Sri Lanka."

In Jaffna, the main city in the Tamil-dominated north, worried residents lined up outside stores and gas stations to stock up on food, fuel and other supplies. Both the government and rebels put some of their forces on alert.

The crisis was ignited Tuesday – while the prime minister was in the United States – when Kumaratunga fired three key ministers who have been instrumental in the government's peace efforts, suspended Parliament for two weeks and deployed troops in the capital.

On Wednesday she imposed a state of emergency to "take stock of the security situation," presidential aide Eric Fernando told The Associated Press.

The emergency order would take effect at midnight Thursday, Fernando said.

The laws give broad power to the military – controlled by Kumaratunga – to make arrests, interrogate suspects and search houses at will. They also give the president lawmaking powers and allow for censorship of the media.

Wickremesinghe's supporters quickly struck back. On Wednesday, more than half the country's parliamentarians pledged support for him and rejected the firings.

"We have full faith in the prime minister," Labor Minister Mahinda Samarasinghe told reporters, quoting from a letter signed by 124 of the country's 225 members of Parliament.

The Tamil Tigers, a secretive, ruthless rebel army that has taken control of wide swaths of northeastern Sri Lanka, has said little since the crisis began.

Fair and balanced comedy

Author, comedian Al Franken to visit campus Friday

By Matthew Webber
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He's good enough, he's smart enough, and doggone it, Fox News commentator Bill O'Reilly hates him.

Comedian Al Franken, a former writer and performer for "Saturday Night Live," will bring his satirical humor to McCain Auditorium on Friday evening.

Franken, the author of the bestseller, "Lies and the Lying Liars Who Tell Them: A Fair and Balanced Look at the Right," perhaps is more well known for his liberal politics than for his comedy. Earlier this year, the Fox News Channel unsuccessfully sued him for infringing upon their "fair and balanced" trademark.

Franken discusses the Fox lawsuit, his "delicious" brand of comedy and which conservatives need to sit down with his beloved "SNL" character, Stuart Smalley.

Question: Do you easily find political humor in today's climate?

Franken: Oh yeah. I just wrote a book about this administration, about the right-wing media. And in immersing myself in this – which I usually am anyway – but in really, really, really digging and really listening and really paying attention and writing about it, I've just gotten more and more irritated with this administration and with its right wing shills in the media.

Q: You've gotten into a lot of trouble with the book. You got sued by Fox News. What was your response to the lawsuit and the people criticizing what you've written?

F: Well, the lawsuit wasn't really that much of a trouble, first of all. There was no actual legal basis to it. The judge in his ruling said that their case was wholly without merit, both legally and factually. I knew that when they brought it.

It was all just a win-win for me, because it was the best kind of publicity you could get for a book. When a book moves off the book pages into the front pages, that's the best thing that can happen. It's hard to assess exactly how much good it did me, but the book went to number one on the New York Times bestseller list in the first week when it had been on the market only two days.

Q: Fox sued you over stealing their trademark phrase, "fair and balanced"...

Q: Well, using it, parodying it...

F: Violating their, infringing on their trademark, I guess, would be what it was.

Q: But what are some phrases you would trademark if you could?

Franken: Oh, I guess "delicious" Laugh. "Low-cal." "Funny." "Handsome" Laughs.

Q: Is that how you would describe yourself, in all those terms?

F: No, I think just funny. Laughs.

Q: You referred to the people at Fox News as shills, so how do you differentiate yourself from people like Bill O'Reilly?

F: Well, I tell the truth. That's a very big difference. I really resent it when people say, "But aren't you doing the same thing they do?" And I don't. I tell the truth. I'm doing the opposite of what they do. I do the exact opposite.

Q: Some people might accuse you of doing the same. I know a lot of people...

F: I know. They do. And they have. And that's what my answer is. There's a big difference between lying and telling the truth. They're almost exactly the opposite.

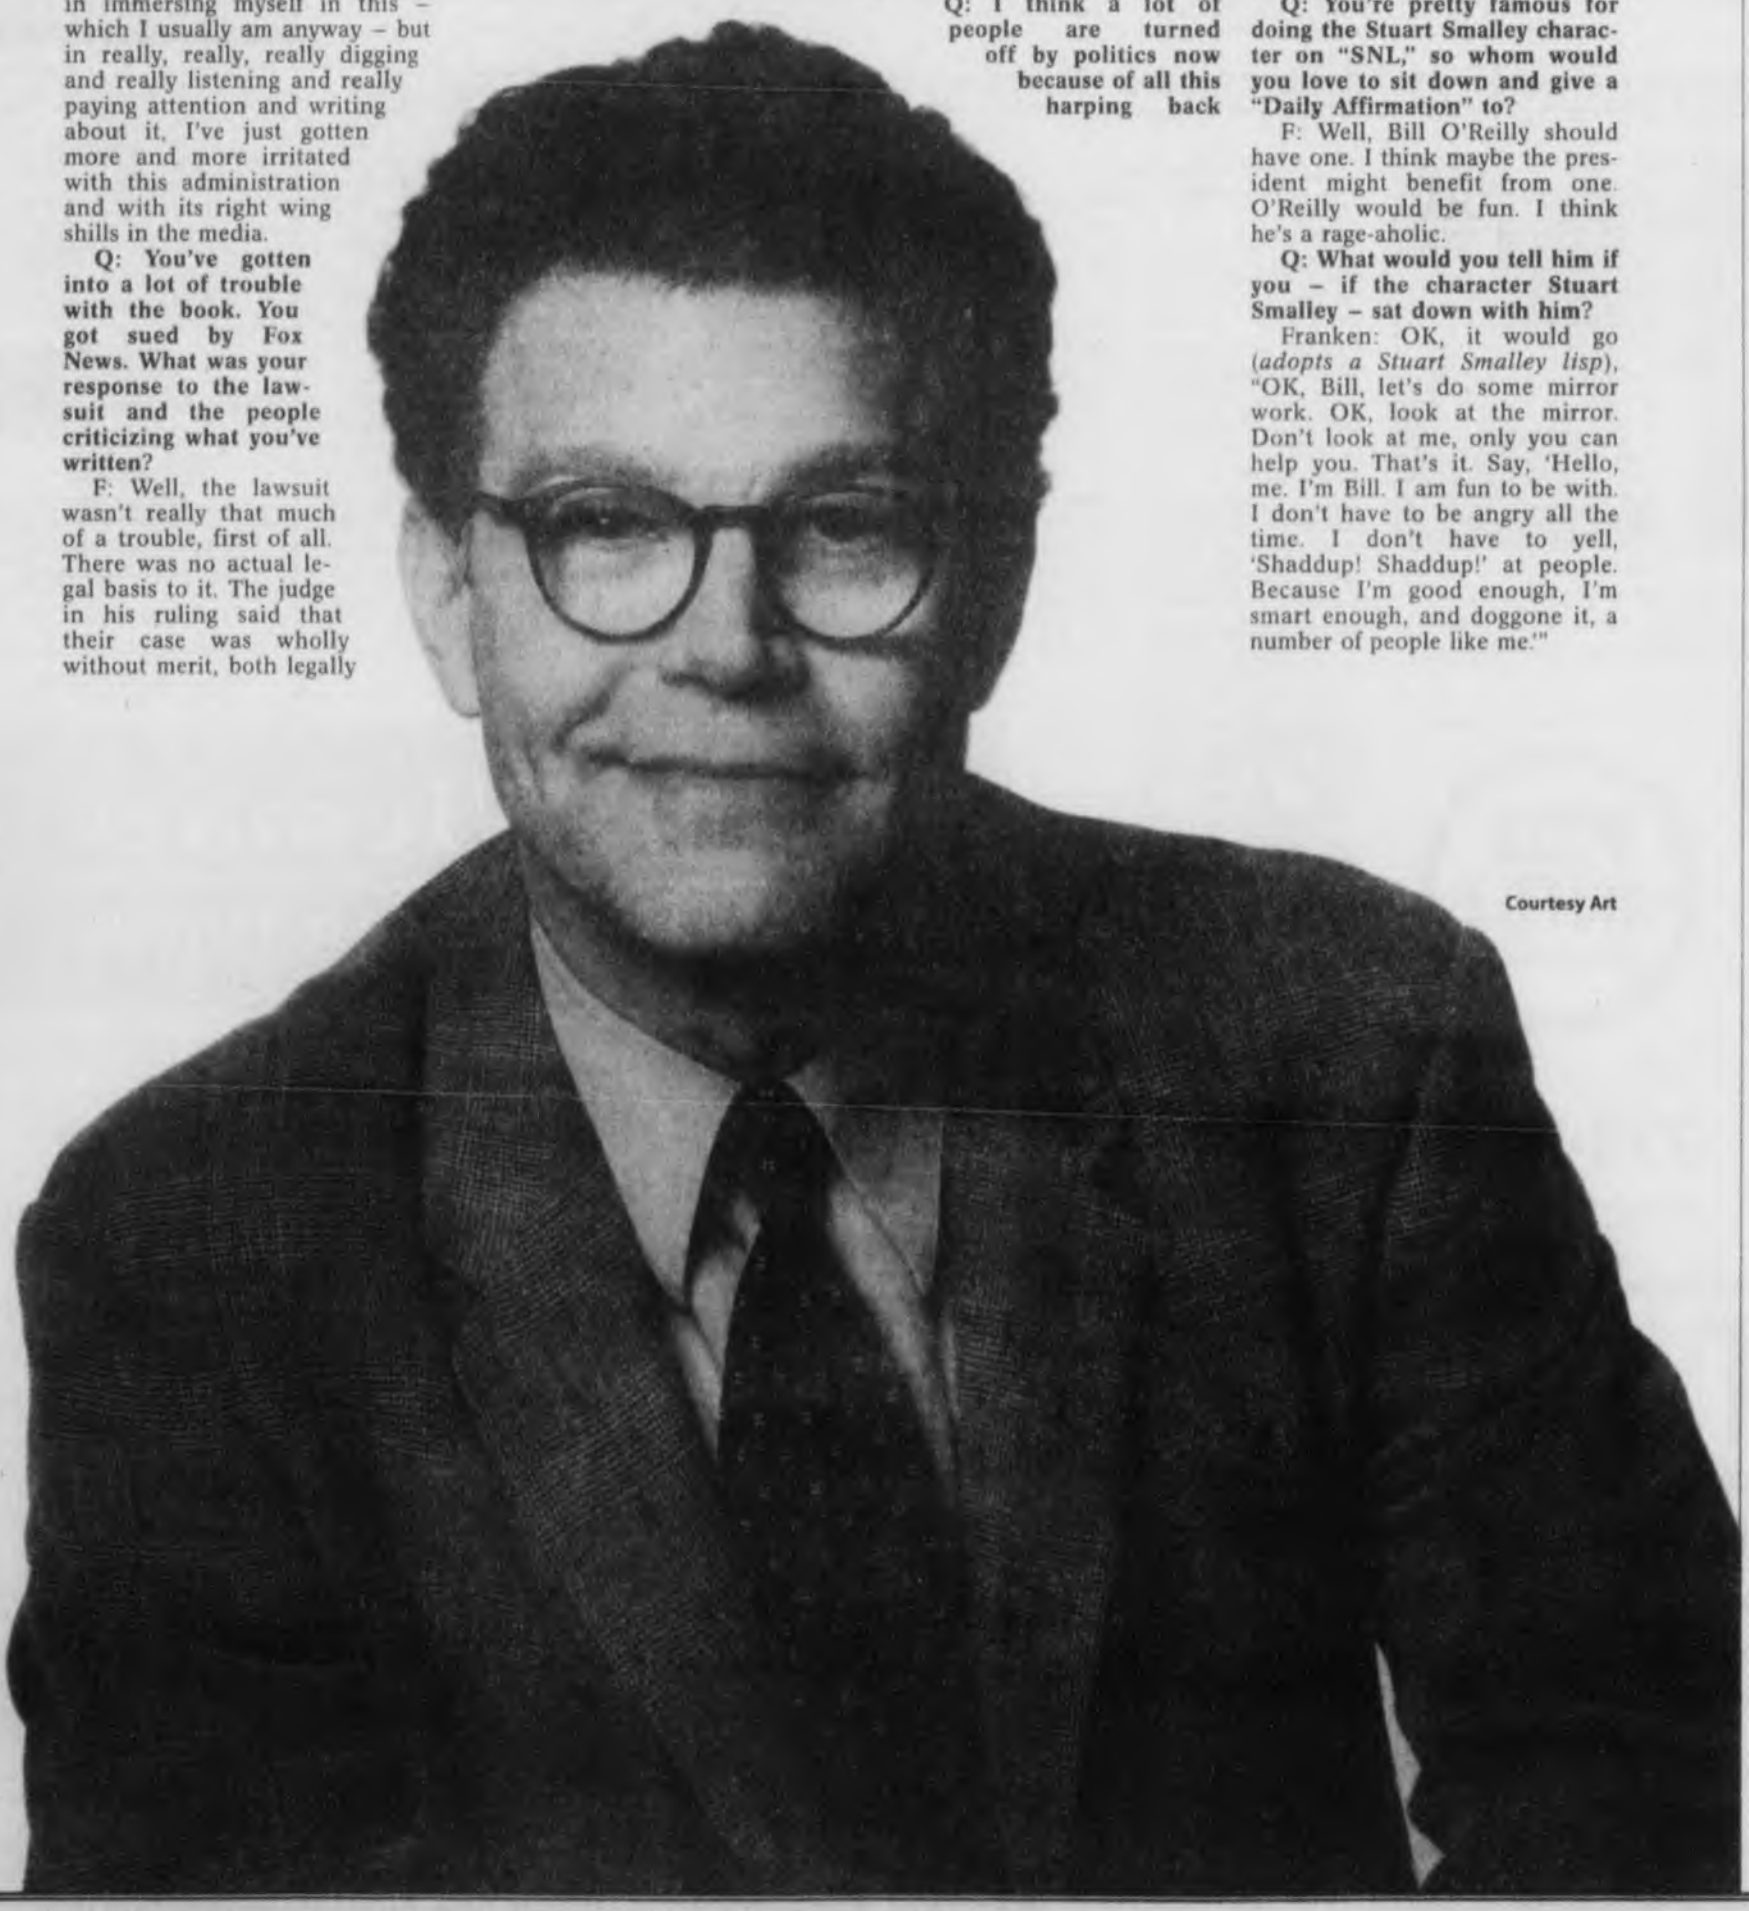
Q: I think a lot of people are turned off by politics now because of all this harping back and forth. Do you feel like you have a duty to get people to care? Or to tell the truth? What do you see as your responsibility as a writer and a satirist?

F: Well, I think my obligation is – it depends. As a satirist, it's to shed light on stuff while making people laugh. It's a way of making points that you can't do without being funny. So satire is a more complex way of looking at issues, or a different way of looking at issues that engages people.

What I've experienced as I go around the country is people who have felt isolated, people who have felt hopeless about the current political situation, and they feel engaged. They feel like there are people thinking the same thing they are. I'm having huge crowds show up, and people are telling me that.

I don't imagine it'll be that much different at Kansas State, and maybe even more so, because I know the campus is fairly conservative. And I think the people who do show up, they generally express a certain amount of gratitude for the book and for it energizing them. And giving them hope.

Q: You're pretty famous for doing the Stuart Smalley character on "SNL," so whom would you love to sit down and give a "Daily Affirmation" to?



F: Well, Bill O'Reilly should have one. I think maybe the president might benefit from one. O'Reilly would be fun. I think he's a rage-aholic.

Q: What would you tell him if you – if the character Stuart Smalley – sat down with him?

Franken: OK, it would go (adopts a Stuart Smalley lisp), "OK, Bill, let's do some mirror work. OK, look at the mirror. Don't look at me, only you can help you. That's it. Say, 'Hello, me. I'm Bill. I am fun to be with. I don't have to be angry all the time. I don't have to yell, 'Shaddup! Shaddup!' at people. Because I'm good enough, I'm smart enough, and doggone it, a number of people like me.'"

Golf course seeks chance to appeal taxation status

County officials question idea

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Colbert Hills golf course hopes to appear before the Riley County Board of Tax Appeals to achieve tax-exempt status.

Unfortunately, it is not turning out to be that easy.

"Colbert Hills wants the county to apply for tax exempt status saying the course is a county golf course," Mike Kearns, Riley County Commissioner, said.

Kearns said he does not believe the county ever got involved with providing entertainment.

"The property was paid for by the sale of bonds by the county," he said. "The county then leases the land to the golf course."

Kearns said it is important to note that the bonds will not be paid off with taxpayer money but rather with the revenue from the golf course.

He said there is an escrow account in St. Louis that would be able to pay off the bonds.

"The land generates $97,000 in property taxes," he said.

Stan Morgan, Riley County counselor, said this is a major cause of the problem.

"That's where the wrinkle comes in," he said. "Statute says the applicant must be the owner of the land in question."

Morgan said commissioners were worried that their signatures would be perceived as an endorsement since they are the legal owners.

"The board of commissioners has no objection to Colbert Hills, or anyone else, applying to the board of tax appeals for tax exemption," he said.

Bob Krause, Vice President of Institutional Achievement at K-State and a member of the golf course board of directors, said the foundation wants a chance to go before the board of taxation appeals.

"Even though it is under lease, technically the county is the owner of the property," Krause said.

Krause said it is only a technical issue, and all they ask for is the county to sign off on the application without prejudice or endorsement.

"There is some confusion that there is a large sum of money somewhere that we can draw from and that simply is not the case," Krause said.

Softball team raises money for national competition, gets ready for tough play

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The softball club is hoping to travel with its 18 members to California at the end of April, 2004.

Time to make the doughnuts.

"This year it's held in California at USC – they're hosting it," Kasey Stadler, junior in bilingual education, said. "The way it works is the champion from the previous year hosts the tournament. The easiest way to get there is to fly, so we're needing to raise about $10,000 in order to fly our whole team down there with hotel expenses, equipment, van rental, tournament fees and everything else."

The team hopes to collect money through fund-raisers.

"We're going to be doing three Krispy Kreme fund-raisers and one bake sale," Stadler said. "We're doing this to raise funds to go to the club softball national tournament."

If the goal amount is not reached, team members will have to cover expenses.

"As much as we can raise is as much as we'll be able to cover," she said. "Last year we weren't able to raise enough money, and the team could only pay for one meal – the rest had to be covered by the team members individually."

The team has started their first fund raiser, Stadler said.

How to

doughnuts can be preordered by e-mailing softball@k-state.edu to send the softball team to national competition.

They have sold Krispy Kreme doughnuts during the Colorado and Baylor football games and also will sell them during the Missouri game.

Because softball is a club sport, taking all the team members on an out-of-state trip might not be realistic, Stadler said.

"It depends a lot on schedules," she said. "Since we're a club organization, we can't always make sure people can go because it's not always a university excused absence, so some people may have to stay for school reasons. No matter how many women we have on the squad every year, there's always a few games or tournaments where we go with just enough girls. It depends on how many people can go, but we'll fund as many people as we can that are able to go."

The national club competition is important to the girls on the team, Coach Richard Baker said.

"I think that they would like to see how they compare with other club teams," he said. "There are no other club teams in the area, so everybody we have to play is a college or a junior college team. They play girls who are on scholarship and that's all they do – my girls have to work and go to school on top of softball."

The softball team would like to see how they fair with teams like themselves, Baker said.

"They would like to play teams closer to their level," he said. "We played the University of Kansas, who is a Division-I team, and we held them scoreless for the first few innings. That is saying a lot for us to go up against a division one and do as well as we did, and I am very pleased. We lost the game, but we put up quite a fight."

The team has been busy this season, Stadler said.

"We have a lot of new girls this year – we have about five returning members from last year's squad, so that puts us in a big rebuilding situation," she said. "We made a lot money last May doing a clinic for young girls. We used the money to purchase new uniforms, which we needed."

Stadler said she is optimistic about the trip.

"I think this year we've got a lot of ambitious girls that are really willing to work hard, so I'm excited for that," she said. "We're hoping to get some new sponsorship. In the years past, Subway and SGA have really helped us out, and we'll hopefully get a little more from SGA for traveling. We're also looking for other outside contributors."

"It's an expensive trip. A lot of teams are under-varsity programs so they have the resources already, but we don't have that luxury here at K-State, so we're really building from scratch."

Kasey Stadler
JUNIOR IN BILINGUAL LANGUAGE

Stadler said the softball team still has a lot of money to gather.

"It's an expensive trip," she said. "A lot of teams are under-varsity programs so they have the resources already, but we don't have that luxury here at K-State, so we're really building from scratch."

Stadler said she thinks the team will do well in California.

"We've made a lot of improvements in the fall season, and I think that things can only get better," she said. "The girls are going to get more experience and learn what to do, and even older girls like me will learn new tricks, so I think we're going to hold our own just fine."

Republicans stand out in Mississippi, Kentucky governor elections

With a presidential campaign only months away, Republicans picked up two governorships in the South, ousting Mississippi's Democratic incumbent and seizing Kentucky's top job for the first time in 32 years.

GOP Washington lobbyist Haley Barbour unseated one-term Democratic Gov. Ronnie Musgrove, while in Kentucky, three-term Republican Rep. Ernie Fletcher defeated Democratic Attorney General Ben Chandler.

President Bush loomed large in both campaigns, and he's sure to claim a boost from the victories. He stumped for both GOP candidates, while Democrats in Kentucky tied their opponent to Bush's economic policies and Musgrove dismissed his challenger as a Washington insider.

Barbour, a former head of the Republican National Committee who said his connections would help Mississippi, told a crowd of supporters: "Get ready to accentuate the positive."

With 95 percent of precincts reporting, Barbour got 53 percent, or 449,041 votes, to Musgrove's 45 percent, or 384,693 votes. With 100 percent of precincts reporting in Kentucky, Fletcher, a three-term congressman, defeated Chandler, polling 55 percent, or 593,489 votes, to the Democrat's 45 percent, or 484,931 votes.

Democrats saw a few bright spots. Philadelphia's Democratic Mayor John Street handily defeated Republican businessman Sam Katz, 59 percent to 41 percent. And Democrats took control of the New Jersey Legislature, breaking a 20-20 tie in the state Senate and defeating the GOP's top Senate leader.

Student finds success despite dyslexia

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"I am becoming more proficient with the scanner. I can multi-task now. I can clean or exercise while listening to class notes or a book."

Clayton Maddux
SOPHOMORE IN PSYCHOLOGY

It can be tough for a kindergartner to learn to read.

Consider, though, how hard it would be for a kindergartner with dyslexia.

Clayton Maddux, sophomore in psychology, was diagnosed with dyslexia in fourth grade, but first he noticed symptoms in kindergarten.

"My fourth-grade teacher recommended that I look into a program called 'RFB&D,'" Maddux said.

RFB&D is an acronym for "Recording for the Blind and Dyslexic." They offer technology that allows students to scan books into computers and listen to the text with earphones.

"When I was sent to them, the program was only for the blind," Maddux said. "I am now using the digital technology, but the electronic voice is still annoying to listen to."

It wasn't until 1995 that the program switched to assisting the dyslexic as well.

When Maddux was in kindergarten, his teachers recommended to his parents that he see an optometrist for his troubles learning to read. In first grade, Maddux was told he needed glasses, but they didn't work.

"I began losing confidence in my education," Maddux said.

"I was placed in special education classes and wasn't very happy with the way things were going for me."

When Maddux started working with RFB&D, he said he gained renewed confidence in his education.

"It was like night and day," Maddux said. "I started to use all of the books that I hadn't been able to use in the past and kept up with the other kids."

Maddux went on to graduate number one in his high school class. He claims none of his success would have come if it weren't for the RFB&D technology.

"I probably never would have graduated from high school if it weren't for RFB&D. I had tried all sorts of stuff, different eye exercises and flash cards," Maddux said.

He said K-State Student Support Services have been supportive of his learning disability.

"Anything that I need, K-State is there to help me out. If I need a book that RFB&D doesn't have, they'll scan it onto a disk for me," Maddux said. "I still have to buy the books because of copyright laws, though."

RFB&D offers recorded books that Maddux said are very convenient to work with.

"I am becoming more proficient with the scanner. I can multi-task now. I can clean or exercise while listening to class notes or a book," Maddux said.

Maddux hasn't worn glasses since his diagnosis and stopped working with the special education classes.

He said he is glad he was diagnosed.

"There were eye doctors that said dyslexia didn't even exist, but that wouldn't fly now," Maddux said.

Maddux attended an awards ceremony for the RFB&D's $6,000 scholarship Oct. 30 in Philadelphia.

"Without RFB&D and parent support, I would have been tested more and more at the eye doctors. My parents spent lots of time reading to me before RFB&D came along," Maddux said.

K-State offers assistance to students with learning disabilities. Gretchen Holden, director of Education and Personal Development, said it's important that people understand learning disabilities come in many forms.

"People can have trouble with reading or math. With dyslexia, people may transpose numbers or letters and make it difficult to carry out everyday assignments," Holden said.

Holden said section 504 of the American with Disabilities Act requires that K-State provides an equal opportunity to learn.

She said that in order to do so, K-State houses a center for help in Holton Hall.

"K-State has about 400 students with attention deficit disorder or another learning disability," Holden said.

Holden said the level of assistance Holton Hall has to offer is limited to students who have proven their disability to a professional.

She said the university offers extra time for tests for students who are unable to finish on time, audio text for those with processing problems, and note takers for students who are unable to keep up with professors.

"There is a very small bag of tricks we provide to help students with learning disabilities," Holden said.

Holden said students with learning disabilities are able to use the services in Holton as often or as seldom as needed.

"Clayton is very independent. He uses our services very seldomly. For a lot of these students, our assistance can make the difference between success and failure," Holden said.

Attacks intensify in Iraq; U.S. convoy ambushed

By Mariam Fam
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSUL, Iraq – Insurgents attacked three American military convoys in this northern city with rocket-propelled grenades and roadside bombs Wednesday, killing three Iraqi civilians and wounding five Americans, the U.S. military and hospital officials said.

The attacks occurred in a city long considered relatively safe for U.S. troops, compared to Baghdad and the cities and towns in the Sunni Triangle to the south.

Elsewhere, paratroopers of the 82nd Airborne Division captured two former Iraqi army generals in Fallujah, the military said. The generals were not identified, but the military said they were suspected of financing and organizing anti-coalition fighters in the volatile city west of Baghdad.

Guerrillas near Fallujah shot down a U.S. Army Chinook helicopter on Sunday, killing 15 soldiers in the bloodiest single strike against American forces since the war began March 20.

No American soldiers were reported killed Wednesday by hostile fire, but one 1st Armored Division soldier died of wounds from a non-hostile gunshot at a checkpoint in Baghdad, the military said.

In Baghdad, the new head of the Iraqi Governing Council, Jalal Talabani, announced he would visit Turkey on Nov. 19 to seek improved relations with Iraq's northern neighbor. He said he also would go to Iran and Syria.

Relations were strained last month when the Turkish parliament voted to allow the government to send troops to join the U.S.-led occupation of Iraq. The Governing Council strongly opposed a deployment because of hostility among the Kurdish minority and ill feelings after four centuries of domination by the Ottoman Turks.

Talabani, who assumed the rotating council presidency Saturday, is a Kurdish politician. Turkey fought a 15-year war against Kurdish rebels, who still have bases in northern Iraq.

On Tuesday, Turkey's ambassador to the United States, Osman Faruk Logoglu, said his country would not send peacekeeping troops into Iraq without an invitation from the Governing Council.

Responding to reported criticism of the Governing Council in an Arab newspaper, Talabani defended the U.S.-appointed body, saying: "The council's representation of the Iraqi people is better than the representation of any Arab country to its people."

BUSH | Officials challenge new bill banning partial-birth abortion

An "Amen" was heard from the audience as Bush sat down at a desk, before a row of American flags, to sign the bill passed last month by Congress.

But less than an hour after Bush put his pen to paper, a federal judge in Nebraska sharply questioned the law's constitutionality and issued a limited temporary restraining order against it. U.S. District Judge Richard Kopf said he was concerned that the ban contains no exception if the woman's health is at risk as he issued an injunction applied only to the four doctors who brought the suit.

"While it is also true that Congress found that a health exception is not needed, it is, at the very least, problematic whether I should defer to such a conclusion when the Supreme Court has found otherwise," Kopf said.

Besides Nebraska, hearings also were taking place in San Francisco and New York City on Wednesday on similar challenges.

Fully aware of the impending legal obstacles, Bush said, to a standing ovation and the longest round of applause during his brief remarks: "The executive branch will vigorously defend this law against any who would try to overturn it in the courts."

The president's signature represented an end to a legislative crusade that began after Republicans captured the House in 1995.

Former President Clinton twice vetoed similar bills, arguing that they lacked an exception to protect the health of the mother.

The law, approved by the House and Senate late last month, prohibits doctors from committing an "overt act" designed to kill a partially delivered fetus and allows no exception if the woman's health is at risk, or if the child would be born with ailments. The procedure, which usually involves puncturing the fetus' skull, generally is performed in the second or third trimester.

discovery of McBride asleep in the sleeping cab, Moldrup said.

McBride is now in a shelter home in police custody in Oklahoma City, the police determined the boy was missing after searching the FBI's National Crime Information Center.

His family was expected to arrive in Oklahoma City on Wednesday evening.

Moldrup said that after getting the call that McBride was safe, the 20 police officers who had been searching for the boy sighed with relief.

"I think everyone was really happy to know he was safe and secure and was not abducted," he said.

An Amber Alert, a national alert system, which gained popularity after the abduction of Elizabeth Smart, was not issued in this case, as police did not suspect foul play. Moldrup said there was no evidence or witnesses to lead police to believe there had been an abduction.

"The bottom line is that no crime has occurred," Moldrup said.

Moldrup said fliers had been passed out all over town, which led to an outpouring of community support.

"We had over 40 people on the list volunteering to help," he said. "I think we would have had a successful conclusion if he had been here. Almost everyone the officers had contact with knew he was missing. If he'd been in the area, we would have found him."

McBride and Abernathy will be interviewed by RCPD officers today, and further information will be released as it becomes available.

ABORTION | Kansas statute provides exceptions in abortion cases

Lawrence Buening, the executive director of Kansas State Board of Healing Arts, which licenses health care professionals, said partial-birth abortions are not legally practiced in Kansas because of the legislation passed in 1998.

"Kansas Statute 65-6721 prohibits partial-birth abortion on a viable fetus unless it is necessary to preserve the life and health of a woman," Buening said.

The statute defines a partial-birth abortion as a procedure which involves the deliberate and intentional evacuation of all or a part of the intracranial contents of a viable fetus prior to removal of such otherwise intact fetus from the body of the pregnant woman.

The statute provides two exceptions when a partial-birth abortion can be performed.

One exception is if the procedure would preserve the life of the woman. Second, it is legal if a continuation of the pregnancy poses a threat of impairing any major physical or mental functions of the woman.

In both cases, the physician performing the abortion is required to obtain a documented referral and diagnosis confirmation from another physician.

Jeanne Gawdun, lobbyist for Kansans for Life, said that between 1998 and 1999 there were about 240 partial-birth abortions performed in Kansas.

"In 1999, they just changed methods, but their goal stayed the same – to kill babies," Gawdun said. She added that since 1999, more than 1,500 abortions were performed on fetuses older than 22 weeks.

According to the KDHE report, almost 12,000 abortions were induced in Kansas in 2002. About 564, or 4.8 percent, were performed 22 or more weeks into pregnancy.

"The methods used these days, such as dilatation and evacuation, are not less cruel than a partial-birth abortion," Gawdun said.

According to a Web site of Women's Health Care Services, one of the largest abortion clinics in the state, dilatation and evacuation, also called D&E, is a removal of fetus and placenta from the uterus with medical instruments such as forceps and suction curettage.

This procedure is performed at up to 24 weeks into pregnancy, and it occasionally involves dismembering the fetus.

About 892 D&E abortions were performed in Kansas in 2002.

Officials at Women's Health Care Services, a clinic in Wichita that provides abortions, declined comment on the issue.

The American Civil Liberties Union, the organization that successfully challenged partial-birth abortion bans in eight states, announced Tuesday that it would legally challenge the bill passed by Senate.

"This ban will prohibit safe abortion procedures used well before fetus viability, including the procedure used for the overwhelmingly majority of abortions after the first trimester," Laura Murphy, director of the ACLU Washington office, said in a press release.

Murphy said the federal ban is effectively no different than a Nebraska law invalidated by the U.S. Supreme Court in 2000. She said that the court struck down Nebraska's ban because it was written so broadly that it criminalized a range of abortion procedures and because it failed to include a health exception.

The federal ban suffers from the same two flaws, Murphy said.

"They are just concerned that their classmate is missing," she said. "They are hopeful he will be back tomorrow."

Sturr said the school was also having to respond to media attention as far away as the Kansas City and Wichita areas.

Teachers did remind students to walk home from school in groups and Sturr said she expected more parents would be picking up their children at the end of the day.

After learning McBride had been found, Sturr said she would first tell Carpenter.

"Mrs. Carpenter would like to tell her students first, and I think an all call is in order," she said.

"I am anticipating a loud cheer."

Theatrical teaching

K-State theater uses play to address social issues

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stacey Pierce, graduate student in drama therapy, watches a play at Woodrow Wilson Elementary School in Manhattan last week. Pierce directs the group that is part of the Growing Tree Theater Co.

Stacey Pierce doesn't think of theater merely as entertainment, but as a means of helping people.

Pierce, second year graduate student in drama therapy, is directing the play "The Miracle Worker," a one-act play based on the life of Helen Keller, performed by the Growing Tree Theatre group. The play focuses on Keller's struggle to learn to communicate through sign language, and will be performed at a total of nine local elementary schools to help teach awareness about social issues.

"We want to use theater as an educational tool," Pierce said.

The group performed the 30-minute cutting of the play at Woodrow Wilson Elementary School on Oct. 31 and will perform again this morning at Amanda Arnold Elementary School and Bergman Elementary School in the afternoon.

As was the case at Woodrow Wilson, Pierce wants the students to take one lesson away with them.

"To look beyond the physical appearance of a person and see the potential they hold within," she said.

Pierce said that theater students have performed educational awareness plays in the past, but they had not done it for five years. Pierce, needing a thesis project, decided to revive the group. She said the cast members are given theater credit through K-State.

85,000 troops to be deployed

Pentagon announces plan to send Army, Marine forces to Iraq in January 2004

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – The Pentagon announced plans Thursday to send 85,000 Army and Marine combat forces to Iraq early next year to relieve troops completing one-year tours – a rotation that when combined with another switchout of troops in Afghanistan will be the Army's largest sequence of troop movements since World War II.

In addition, 43,000 National Guard and Reserve support troops have been alerted that they may be sent as well.

The moves are part of a rotation plan that assumes Iraqis will be capable of contributing enough to the battle against the anti-occupation insurgency that the number of American troops in Iraq can be reduced from 131,600 today to 105,000 by May, senior officials said.

In an added twist, the Army announced that soldiers in every unit designated for deployment to Iraq next year – whether active-duty or reserve – will be prohibited from leaving the service during a period beginning 90 days before they go to 90 days after they return.

1st Pole, 2 Americans die Thursday in Iraq

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Poland suffered its first combat death since the aftermath of World War II when a Polish major was fatally wounded Thursday in an ambush south of Baghdad. Two American soldiers died in attacks near the capital and along the Syrian border.

Kupczyk

In al-Assad, a windblown desert base 150 miles northwest of Baghdad, hundreds of soldiers, some wearing ceremonial spurs and black regimental hats, remembered 15 comrades killed last weekend when their helicopter was shot down in the deadliest single attack against U.S. forces since the Iraq war began March 20.

The Polish officer was wounded when insurgents attacked a convoy of 16 Polish soldiers returning from a promotion ceremony for Iraqi civilian defense trainees near Baghdad. Maj. Hieronim Kupczyk, 44, died at a military hospital in Karbala, the Polish Defense Ministry said.

None of the other Polish soldiers was killed or wounded, according to Polish Defense Minister Jerzy Szmajdzinski.

"This tragic event proves that the situation in Iraq is getting complicated," Szmajdzinski told reporters in Warsaw. "The level of professionalism of the terrorists is increasing."

Resolution tabled again

SGA may wait for another 2 weeks on issue

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate will not vote on a recent resolution addressing Mayor Mark Taussig's marriage proclamation for at least another week.

Seth Bridge, Governmental Relations Committee chair, said the committee must review the resolution before Senate can vote on it. They plan to review it at 8 p.m. Monday, he said.

"If there's changes that need to be made, we will make them," he said.

Senators first read the resolution at the Oct. 23 meeting. The resolution was sent to the committee but the committee tabled it until the first meeting after Pack the Library Night.

"We felt Pack the Library was an event we had been looking at for too long and wanted to focus all of our attention on the resolution," he said.

"We felt this was an issue important enough to a wide variety of students that we needed to look at it hard. It came at an inopportune time. We've been trying to focus on lobbying for higher education, but we realize this is an important issue that needs a lot of time. We're not going to allow it to come out of our committee until we've given it that amount of time."

After the committee reviews the resolution, Bridge said there are two possible actions it can take – they can table the resolution again or they can send it to Senate for senators to vote on.

Center's director
K-State has selected retired Army Col. David R. Franz, a former United Nations weapons inspector, to lead the school's new National Agricultural Biosecurity Center. The $50-million center, scheduled to open in about two years, is expected to attract top scientists because of its high-security laboratories.

Ban blocked
The legal attack against a new ban on certain late-term abortions rapidly escalated Thursday as federal judges in New York and California blocked the law, delivering a major setback to President Bush only a day after he signed the measure.

French program
France's prime minister announced Thursday a $10.8 billion program for the elderly — financed in part by eliminating a national holiday — to improve health care and guard against catastrophes like the summer heat wave that killed nearly 15,000 people, many of them seniors.

New nickel
After 65 years with hardly a change, the nickel is getting two new looks next year — one design will feature clasped hands of friendship between the U.S. government and American Indians, and the second will show Lewis and Clark on a keelboat. Thomas Jefferson will stay on the "heads" side.

MINNIE DRIVER TO SPEND TIME IN SWEATSHOP

Oscar nominee Minnie Driver plans to spend time in a Cambodian sweatshop for a project she hopes will draw attention to the plight of exploited workers in poor countries, a newspaper reports.

"I will be working alongside other young women for as long as it takes for me to raise awareness of the fair trade issue," Driver told The Evening Standard at the London premiere of the movie "Seabiscuit."

The newspaper reported that Driver said she and a photographer friend hoped to make a documentary or perhaps write a book about the experience. She said she hoped her effort would help improve pay and working conditions for those in poor nations.

COULD IT BECOME "WILL & GRACE & BABY"?

Debra Messing, star of the NBC comedy, "Will and Grace," is pregnant, spokeswoman Annette Wolf said Friday. The baby, due next summer, is the first for Messing and her husband, screenwriter Daniel Zelman.

Messing

The TV news magazine "Access Hollywood" reported her pregnancy on Friday's show.

Messing stars opposite Eric McCormack in the comedy about a straight woman and her gay best friend. Messing's character, Grace, was married last season to Leo, played by actor-singer Harry Connick Jr.

NBC had no comment on whether Messing's pregnancy would be written into the series, a network spokeswoman said.

PHIL SPECTOR FREE ON BAIL

Record producer Phil Spector's $1 million bail was extended a second time while the district attorney's office considers whether to charge him in the shooting death of a woman at his home in February.

Spector, 62, who is free on bail, has denied he killed Lana Clarkson. He suggested in an Esquire magazine interview that Clarkson, an actress and hostess at the House of Blues, may have shot herself.

The decision to extend Spector's bail to Jan. 9 was made between lawyers and the judge in Spector's case, Superior Court spokesman Allan Parachini said Friday. He said he did not know when the decision was made or who had requested the extension.

Fire regulation shuts down haunted house

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Halloween might not have been as fun this year, but at least it was safe. Because of a state fire regulation that came into effect in July, all haunted houses or special amusement structures were required to have automatic fire sprinklers and fire alarm systems, as well as continuous and uninterrupted paths from an interior room to an exit.

This regulation was particularly devastating to the Wonder Workshop Children's Museum, 821 Poyntz Ave., which uses its haunted house for a fund raiser.

"We put our hopes and dreams into this, and from a financial perspective, we rely on it to pay the bills," said Richard Pitts, director of the Wonder Workshop.

After being open for one of the five nights Wonder Workshop's haunted house was scheduled to be available, it was closed down Oct. 30.

Pitts said the structure didn't have a sprinkler system and thus didn't meet the new fire ordinance.

Manhattan Fire Marshall Jim McDiffett said codes such as this are based on cases that have repeatedly resulted in loss of life or property. He said although there haven't been specific problems in Manhattan, the ordinance was issued by the state.

"We've tried our best to help everyone that has had a haunted house to come up with a place that meets the requirements. "Most of us enjoy a good scare as much as the next person – as long as it's a safe scare," McDiffett said.

Despite having their hard work go to waste, Pitts said the 40-some volunteers who were helping with the haunted house sprang back with new ideas for other ways to raise money.

"One of the remarkable thing about humans is that we are resilient – we bounce back. "We had meetings with the volunteers and they had great ideas to come back and raise money for the children's museum. That meant so much to me to know they cared"

Pitts said the Wonder Workshop decided to have a fried and barbecue chicken dinner on Nov. 14 and a perennial plant sale Nov. 15.

Eclipse coming Saturday evening

Meteor shower to follow within next few weeks

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The sky is falling, the moon is hiding and local residents have a chance to catch a glimpse of both.

There will be a lunar eclipse Saturday evening, followed by the annual Leonid Meteor Shower, which will peak around Nov. 19.

A lunar eclipse occurs when the sun, Earth and moon are in a line with the moon in the Earth's shadow.

It should be best seen sometime around 7 p.m., Michael O'Shea, physics professor, said. The peak of the eclipse should last about 20 minutes.

Lunar eclipses occur at irregular intervals. There sometimes are multiple eclipses in a year and sometimes there are none for several years, O'Shea said.

The eclipse should be visible from anywhere with a clear view of the moon.

The meteor shower, though, will require dark surroundings to view it clearly.

About 100 meteors will enter the Earth's atmosphere per hour during the peak of the shower, which O'Shea said probably will occur just before dawn Nov. 19.

The shower occurs because the Earth passes through the remnants of a comet, and the debris appears as shooting stars as it enters the atmosphere.

Nobel winner to lecture, present prized research

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Physics students, come one and all.

Carl Wieman, 2001 Nobel Prize Winner, is coming to the Department of Physics to give a description of his work, and he will present "Resonant BEC: A New Macroscopic Quantum System," at 3:30 today.

Wieman won his Nobel Prize for his extensive research in laser spectrocopy, also known as using laser light to cool atoms.

He also has received the National Science Foundation's Distinguished Teaching Scholar Award and is a member of the National Academy of Sciences, the Board of Physics and Astronomy, the Committee on Undergraduate Science Education and the National Task Force on Undergraduate Physics.

Chii Dong Lin, distinguished professor of physics, said the lecture is for faculty and graduate students, but anyone is invited to attend.

"People are allowed to attend the Colloquium at 3:30, but maybe it is beyond what most people can comprehend," Lin said.

Lin said smaller universities in the area will attend the lecture today.

He also said Wieman will visit the different physics research labs around campus.

"He will be visiting the physics department, and we will be telling him what we are doing. In exchange, he'll speak to us all and tell us what he's been doing and has done," Lin said.

Lin said Wieman's speech is the second of its type this year.

"He's actually the second Nobel Prize Winner the physics department has brought in this year. We've been very successful in bringing in popular people this year," Lin said.

Dean Zollman, distinguished professor and head of the physics department, said the department expected Wieman to speak at K-State.

"He's a friend to a lot of people here in the physics department, it was an opportunity he was willing to take," Zollman said.

Zollman said having two Nobel Prize winners in a year wasn't a coincidence.

"I hope it says they like us. We are doing good quality work. Recent work is good enough that people are interested in seeing what we are doing," Zollman said.

Concert to honor U.S. war veterans

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the third year, the Flint Hills Veterans Coalition will present a Salute to America.

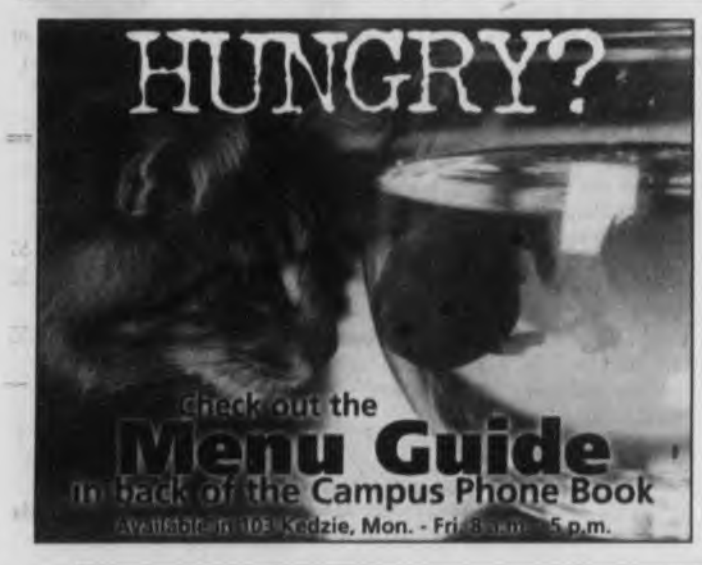
American Legion Post 17 will present colors, and Boy Scout Troop 75 will lead the Pledge of Allegiance.

The Flint Hills Veterans Coalition is an organization made up of local veteran's organizations and others that conduct Veterans Day in Manhattan, said Lowell Jack, special events chairman for the Flint Hills Veterans Coalition.

Jack said the musical talent is chosen based on his own experience and recommendations from others.

"I just have been in town long enough to know these people. I made calls to the KSU music department. I've heard some of these people sing – Linda Utoff, the Charades and the Barefoot Dixieland Band," Jack said.

Jack said the coalition's other special projects include visiting local area nursing homes and presenting flags to veterans.



"A lot of the people aren't able to leave nursing homes, so we present them with flags to thank them for serving their country," Jack said.

TO THE POINT

Student Senate needs to address issue quickly

After two weeks of sitting on the issue, Student Senators need to finally address Mayor Mark Taussig's marriage proclamation.

Taussig's proclamation – designed to protect marriage between one man and one woman – has prompted a lot of response from the K-State and Manhattan communities.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

A group of Student Senators proposed a resolution which states the proclamation is "an assault on the basic human rights and dignity of many members of the Manhattan community."

The resolution also states concern that Taussig's action imposed certain beliefs on the whole community.

Whether Senate passes or denies the resolution, they need to take action soon. When a resolution is proposed, it cannot be simply ignored for a period of time, especially when it is evident so many students care about the issue.

Student Senators were elected by the student body as representatives. It is their job to represent the students on issues important to them.

They are failing their constituents by not addressing this issue in a timely fashion.

AMY LINK

Amy Link delves into the cancellation of the CBS miniseries "The Reagans" amidst pressure from advertisers and political parties.

America needs to write its laws in a more readable manner, argues Jesse Loewen, which means shortening them and using simpler language.

Bad analogy

Iraq will not be a repeat of Vietnam unless U.S. forces manage to foul up

ANDREW LAWSON

Cliché of the year: Iraq is the next Vietnam.

Anyone who pulls out this phrase on air or in print needs to be forced to take an intensive two-week history course.

Iraq is nothing like Vietnam, but if we continue our current course, it may share one very sad attribute with the Diem government.

Kenneth Pollack, a researcher with the Brookings Institute, explains, "The central problem in Vietnam was that we had a corrupt and ineffective local government that did not inspire either the allegiance or the confidence of the Vietnamese people. Whatever happened militarily became secondary to this fundamental political reality."

Illustrations by Kent Holle | COLLEGIAN

In Vietnam, the lack of trust in the government dated back to French colonial occupation.

A certain segment of Vietnamese "nobility" became the elites under French rule. They adopted French culture, learned the French language, educated their children in Paris and, most importantly, served as local and regional government officials.

The average rice farmer never felt any loyalty to those officials when they became the nominal government of an independent South Vietnam. It is almost impossible for us today to understand the class stratification that existed in the South.

Of course, these are the same people that sympathized with, aided, abetted and served in the Viet Cong. Despite our military's efforts to "win the hearts and minds" of the South Vietnamese, we were doomed to failure as long as we supported the existing, corrupt government and probably doomed regardless.

More than any other people on Earth in the 20th century, the South Vietnamese truly believed in the message of communism as a "people's republic."

Fast forward to 2003. What are the significant differences?

First, there is no one dominant ethnic or religious class like the Vietnamese elites. Though Arabs make up the majority of Iraq's population, the Kurds are a more than significant minority. Likewise, though most of Iraq is Sunni, the Shi'ites in the south are long practiced at preserving their own existence.

Second, though there is some evidence other Middle East countries are helping foreign fighters infiltrate Iraq to raise hell, such resistance is nowhere near as organized as that of the North Vietnamese Army or Viet Cong forces who used the Ho Chi Minh Trail to insinuate themselves throughout the Vietnamese theater.

Finally, we are not propping up a corrupt dictatorship. We removed one. What we are attempting to do is create a representative democracy that incorporates all of Iraq's citizenry, Kurdish or Arab, Sunni or Shi'a.

None of this prevents the situation from degenerating into a new Vietnam if we screw up, though.

The signs of danger are on the horizon. Against his initial inclination, civilian administrator L. Paul Bremer has acceded to the plan to speed training of the new Iraq army.

Pressure is mounting to forcibly hurry a transfer of power to the Iraqis, even when Afghanistan and the escalating violence in the "Sunni Triangle" around Baghdad testify that such an action is horribly risky at best.

We have a golden opportunity to take a step toward dramatically altering the social, economic and political problems of the Middle East, but this is our only chance. We cannot afford to mess it up by rushing a delicate job.

If we do, we will surely have to intervene down the road when Zakaria's vision and the reality of Iraq converge, conjuring nightmares of Vietnam.

College can teach students meaning of responsibility

TAMMY JO OSBORN

The usual peace of the laundromat was interrupted when a family tribe entered, and the quiet erupted into laughter, smiles and the sound of winter garments swishing with busy movement. The calming swirl of the machines was replaced by chattering voices.

Trailing the entering parade was a young boy, no more than two years old. In oversized clothes, dragging his heavy shoes and giving me one of those innocent baby faces, it only took him only a second to capture my heart.

When I smiled at him, his poker face slowly erupted into a grin, and he tumbled off towards his mom, looking for the comfort of a leg behind which he could hide his saucer-like brown eyes.

I may be 23 years old and not married, but lately I keep having these visions of little kids, and the subsequent motherly feelings seem to come whether I want them to or not. These unstoppable thoughts scare me.

College is usually thought of as a time to escape responsibility, and for so long I thought I had done that. I have since found out it is really a place where we finally learn what that word even means.

Responsibility surrounds us every day. It is in our actions, what our peers and younger friends are looking up to. It is how we treat our family members, those different from us and those who let us down.

So many think it is simply learning to pay the bills on time or keeping the house clean, but it is so much more.

It is doing what you know you should do, and actually wanting to do it. If you don't, you make that choice.

It may be easy during college to escape responsibility for a while, but it is a perfect time to learn what it means.

So, when those little kids do come along – and they will – it will be only natural that you serve as a good example of how you want them to live as they grow.

I admit I am far from ready for the responsibility of a child, and you may be in the same position, but I know I must be ready and so I work to become that way. How?

I do so by making healthy lifestyle choices, determining my moral philosophy now, talking to individuals already in that situation so I can learn now what I need to work on and, most importantly, making decisions that will prepare me to make the important people in life my top priority.

As for me, I have the wonderful example of my mother to thank for preparing me to be a good mom and a good citizen of society. If I can be half of what she was, then I will consider myself a success.

Learning to be the people we need to be, and living that out as an example to others, will make our world the place we have always dreamed it could be – with leaders, friends and family members that we respect, admire and love.

So, when I have these familial yearnings after losing my heart to those big eyes and precious smiles, I can thank my mom for helping me to be a responsible person, ready to exit college and take on the selflessness a parent, a friend or a sibling needs to succeed.

If there has been a person like that in your life, be sure to thank them and, the next time you start to act, be sure to know that what you are doing is something you wouldn't mind your kids, your sibling or that person who looks up to you doing.

That is how you change the world.

PERSPECTIVES

CBS right to not show miniseries

By Matt Maddox
THE BATTALION (TEXAS A&M U.)

COLLEGE STATION, Texas – This fall, there were two hatchet jobs made into movies. The first is the "Texas Chainsaw Massacre," the gory remake of the classic horror movie. The second film of the fall is the gruesome remake of the legacy of President Ronald Reagan, a pitiful attempt to duplicate the presidency, and one that is not worth viewers' time or money to see.

CBS was right to cancel the made-for-TV movie about the Reagans, but Showtime will have to make numerous fundamental changes to the film before it does justice to one of the greatest presidents of the 20th century.

"The Reagans," which has been in the making for four years, was scheduled to air on CBS on Nov. 18. Much to the displeasure of its producers, there has been a public outcry in the wake of the release of its script. The Media Research Center called on advertisers to boycott the film, while the Republican National Committee asked that CBS submit the film to historians for review prior to release.

Critics of the film are not just coming from the political right, though. Merv Griffin, a Hollywood icon and friend of the Reagan family, said of the film, "It's a cowardly act. Is that what the 'C' stands for in CBS?"

The faults of the movie are almost too many to count. The largest fault is the film's complete lack of historical accuracy. In one scene, Reagan tells the first lady that AIDS patients deserve to die. Not only did Reagan never say such a thing, as admitted by the producers of the movie, but Reagan greatly expanded funding for AIDS research during his presidency.

The lies in the film don't stop there.

According to critics who have seen its previews, the biopic libelously portrays Nancy Reagan as the true leader in the White House while Reagan is afflicted with Alzheimer's. There is no evidence Nancy made any executive decisions or that Reagan suffered from Alzheimer's during his presidency. It also falsely shows Nancy as an abusive mother addicted to prescription drugs. This level of smear can only be motivated by one thing: Hate.

Perhaps the greatest testament to the slanderous intentions of the film's producers is the cast. According to The Washington Post, those making the film are ideological enemies of the Reagan. James Brolin, the actor who portrays President Reagan, is married to Democratic activist Barbra Streisand. Actress Judy Davis, who plays Nancy Reagan in the film, and Craig Zadan and Neil Meronis, the film's producers, all are self-described liberals.

Avowed communists must be kicking themselves for not making this kind of propaganda themselves during the Cold War.

CBS was right to stop its airing of "The Reagans." Presenting such grossly fictional material as historical fact does a great disservice to the education of the younger generation.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Students need to utilize meal program

Editor,

I am deeply alarmed by the fact that K-State lacks informal student-faculty interaction.

Thus, I see it as crucial to properly implement the Faculty Meal Program, which was created as an effort of the Department of Housing and Dining Services to close the gap between students and faculty.

The program provides educational opportunities for residence hall students to invite a faculty member to lunch or dinner in one of its dining centers.

The problem with the program is it is, extremely unpopular – only nine students out of 3,750, or 0.2 percent, have used it so far this semester. Is it a case of a lack of student initiative or the program's inefficiency?

First, it is clear the program doesn't encourage student participation, as it hasn't created the means to reach all hall residents, catering primarily to resident assistants.

Second, there are limitations on the scope of the program. Only students who reside in the halls are offered the service. Only one faculty member can be brought in at a time. Moreover, it involves some planning ahead of time. Processing a meal ticket takes a minimum of 48 hours.

Thus, it is critical that the K-State Faculty Meal Program be intensely and fully utilized to reach its potential. Student demand for the program needs to be effectively generated.

There are at least two ways Housing and Dining can do that – by putting more effort into advertising and by launching a broad awareness campaign on the issue.

Next, the Faculty Meal Program needs to be modified, shifting its focus from exclusivity. Then it needs to reconsider policies to handle an increased student body.

What will happen if more than 0.2 percent of students decide to make use of the service? In the long run, will K-State live up to its mission statement of serving students?

I urge you to take action.

Coming from Belarus, a totalitarian country in Eastern Europe, the last thing I expected to do in the United States was persuade American students to be more informal, striving and open-minded.

Reader's information about system mostly incorrect

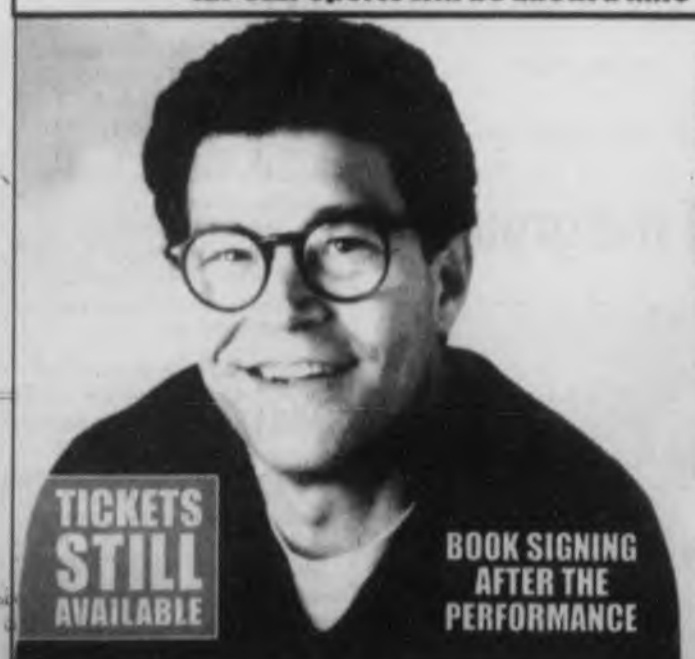
Editor,

Chris Sperling's Nov. 6 letter to the editor, "Honor System Needs Replacing," contains some inaccuracies that need to be addressed.

First, a careful reading of Sarah Rice's original article makes it clear the Honor System is four years old, not nine, and is now in its fifth year. The Honor System came into existence at the start of the fall 1999 semester with the unanimous approval of the Honor Council, Student Senate and Faculty Senate. At that time, the provost hoped the Honor System would be an accepted part of the K-State culture within five years. One indication that might be happening is that the graduate school now is considering constitutional and bylaws changes that will make them part of the Honor System in the near future.

Second, Sperling's letter makes reference to the XF sanction, which could be one of numerous possible sanctions imposed as a result of an Honor Pledge violation. The F indicates the failure in the course; the X indicated the reason is an Honor Pledge violation. Although the F will permanently remain on the student's transcript, the course can be repeated for an additional grade, used to calculate the grade point average. The X can be removed by enrolling in and passing the Academic Integrity course, the content of which can be reviewed at our Web site at www.k-state.edu/honor. Sperling is wrong when he suggests the XF is a permanent "scarlet letter."

Third, K-State, unlike the University of Virginia, is not a single-sanction school. At Virginia, a student who, for example, signs the name of an absent classmate on an attendance roster will receive the same sanction as the student who plagiarizes a term paper – permanent expulsion. The guiding principle of the K-State Honor System is that human beings can learn from their mistakes. The Academic Integrity course, unique in academia, has been instrumental in helping Honor Pledge violators learn about both academic honesty as well as the importance of personal integrity in all human endeavors.



Fourth, student Honor Council members are not intimidated by the opinions of faculty Honor Council members. My experience as director clearly suggests both student and faculty Honor Council members listen to and respect the opinions expressed by all. Hearing Panel votes are by secret ballot. We do all we can to ensure that fairness and confidentiality are maintained. I invite Sperling to drop by the Honor Council office at 215 Fairchild Hall sometime so we can explain more of our doings in person as well as entertain his concerns.

Women's basketball allows time for freshmen

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At one point in the first half of K-State's 73-51 exhibition win over Washburn on Wednesday, Coach Deb Patterson made a line change.

Five fresh players checked in from the scorer's table, something that was literally impossible one year ago.

In the debut of five freshmen, Patterson substituted liberally, trying every conceivable combination of players to gain a sense of having a 14-player team.

"I was real pleased we had the opportunity to give everyone just a little court time and get a feel for them in rotation," she said. "Sometimes we had as many as three freshmen on the floor.

"We got a lot of combinations on the floor and that was one of our goals – play combinations and get people out there."

It did cause havoc with rhythm, however. Washburn went on a 12-5 run to end the first half and close to within 35-23 at halftime, and the Lady Blues held their own in the second half, at one point trailing, 50-39.

That irregular substitution pattern isn't likely to happen when the Cats, ranked No. 5 in the preliminary ESPN/USA Today Coaches Poll, play their final tuneup against Sparta Praha Sunday at 2 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum.

"The next exhibition game my intention going in is to be more disciplined and more direct with respect to our substitution pattern," Patterson said. "We won't respond to the nature of the game, but to the plan we bring into the game and try to stick to the plan."

That would suit junior forward Kendra Wecker, who had 14 points but played just 22 minutes.

Manning's good name in jeopardy after alleged acts

LOUIE NOVAK

I have a brother, Andy, who is six years older than me.

When I was younger he used to put me in the wrestling move called the "Boston Crab" and sit on my face.

Man, I hated him for that, and thought there was nothing more disgusting than having his ass planted directly on my noggin. I thought it was the most degrading thing a human being could do to another.

Apparently, Manning, who is one of the good ol' boys in the NFL, is having to defend himself against a gem of a defamation lawsuit, the record of which includes a graphic description of an act he is being accused of committing against a female assistant trainer while he was a star at the University of Tennessee.

Jamie Ann Naughright, former trainer for the Tennessee Volunteers, claims Manning, while being examined by Naughright, placed his "naked butt and rectum" on her face.

Manning, of course, has a conflicting version and claimed that while in the training room, in a response to a track athlete who made a comment toward him, Manning dropped his shorts to moon the athlete.

Manning said, "I did it thinking the trainer wasn't where she would see... Even when she did, it seemed like something she'd have laughed at, considering the environment, or shrugged off as harmless. Crude, maybe, but harmless."

I played football all through high school and even one year in college. I have provided my share of full moons and have joked around in both locker and training rooms. I agree with Manning that those actions are "crude but harmless."

However, Naughright and her lawyer have provided a much different version of the events. What she is claiming is just downright "dirty."

In a court filing, her lawyer wrote that she was examining Manning to see why the star quarterback was having pain in one of his feet. He continued that when crouched behind him, an "entirely unprovoked Peyton Manning decided to pull down his shorts and sit on Dr. Naughright's head and face."

Naughright painted a perfect picture in her deposition, stating "it was the gluteus maximus, the rectum, the testicles and the area between the testicles. And all that was on my face when I pushed him up... To get leverage, I took my head out to push him up and off."

That is pretty rotten. If this lady is making this story up for some quick cash, she sure went all out.

Things don't look good for Manning in this one. Court records include a letter to Manning from former Tennessee cross country runner Malcolm Saxon, who Manning said was his intended target for his mooning.

Written in December 2002, the letter reads in part, "Bro, you have tons of class, but you have shown no mercy or grace to this lady who was on her knees seeing if you had a stress fracture...

"She was minding her own business when your book came out. Peyton, the way I see it, at this point, you are going to take a hit either way, if you settle out of court or if it goes to court. You might as well maintain some dignity and admit what happened."

I admire Peyton Manning. He is one of the most beloved college athletes in Tennessee history, and to me is a perfect example of what is right in college sports.

But, if he actually committed this act, he might be the most disgusting s.o.b in all of sports.

Cats fall in 1st exhibition game despite plays

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Disjointed" and "inconsistent" were the words Coach Jim Wooldridge used to describe K-State's first exhibition game.

But "wow" was the word common among the 5,939 in attendance.

The Wildcats might have looked ugly through much of their 79-67 loss to EA Sports Thursday night, but several jaw-dropping plays from a highly-touted group of rookies highlighted the game.

Cartier Martin, a freshman from Houston, led K-State with 21 points, nine rebounds, two assists and two blocks.

Junior college transfers Justin Williams and Jeremiah Massey added 10 and eight respectively, and Dez Willingham, another freshman from Texas, scored seven.

On what likely was the most dramatic play of the game, Willingham was working the ball across the top of the court, then looking straight ahead, zinged a pass to his right, through the defense, to Martin, who slammed it home.

"That's Cartier," Willingham said. "He does that in practice, when we're outside playing in front of the dorm. He can play."

Early in the first half it looked like the newcomers would provide enough of a spark.

Massey scored first, and K-State maintained a 12-4 lead early, but EA Sports, relying on sharp outside shooting from Sean Fountain and Mike Brownlee, took the lead at the 10-minute mark in the first half and never looked back.

K-State didn't do much to stem the tide, either. The team finished with 20 turnovers and only shot 37 percent from the field.

The Wildcats will get their first head-to-head action as they take on in-state rival Kansas at 9 a.m. Saturday in the Sunflower Showdown at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

"Head to head races are much more intense, because when you look across you see someone's face," Coach Patrick Sweeney said. "It's just you and them, and you know how you are doing all the way down."

The two schools have raced each other every fall since 1997, with K-State sweeping every event for the first time last fall.

From 1979 until 1989, they coached together.

Dan McCarney, a holdover from the Bob Cummings era at Iowa, joined Bill Snyder and Hayden Fry from North Texas, melding into a coaching staff that later included current K-State assistant Bob Elliot.

Snyder ran the offense for the Hawkeyes, while McCarney, now head coach at Iowa State, coached the defensive lines for Iowa teams that went to eight consecutive bowl games, including two Rose Bowls.

On Saturday, the two will meet once again at Jack Trice Stadium in Ames, Iowa, for a 1:10 p.m. kickoff between the Cyclones (2-6, 0-4) and the Wildcats (7-3,3-2).

Cartoons not just for kiddies

JACOB WALKER
GUEST COLUMN

I'm here today to talk about cartoons. This is a subject I consider very important. More important, in fact, than going to classes.

This morning I woke up four hours late, but my first thought had nothing to do with my missed classes. Instead, I immediately was concerned about whether or not my roommates had taped the new "South Park" the night before.

Cartoons have carved themselves a surprisingly respectable niche in television media. The pioneers, "The Simpsons," "Beavis and Butthead" and "South Park," all seem to share a common goal – to break the rules of convention and piss people off while entertaining their rapidly growing audiences.

In the beginning, the visual quality took a major back seat to the writing, which made for interesting, albeit immature, humor. Once they had everyone's attention, these shows began to evolve from their childish prototypes into intelligent, mature humor.

Granted, "Beavis and Butthead" never really did this. Instead, they just reveled in immaturity, which probably was the cause of their unfortunate, yet timely, demise.

In the meantime, "Family Guy" crashed onto the cartoon scene, premiering on network television after the 1999 Super Bowl. With no warning whatsoever, "Family Guy" took the premise of the "The Simpsons" –suburban nuclear family complete with Mom, Dad, 2.5 kids and a pet dog – and ran rampant with it.

The baby son, Stewie, spends his waking existence cussing out his mother and trying to kill her with advanced super villain technology. The dog is an alcoholic; the son a lumbering oaf; the father a good blend of both.

The results were explosive: nearly every person who was capable of being offended by a cartoon blew their lid. "Family Guy" got the ax after its first season, but a tidal wave of fan support brought it back from the dead. It was canceled again after its third season, following a particularly controversial episode. (Hint: popularly referred to as "the feminist episode")

The fans once again resurrected it, but its fate was fairly sealed. Fox canceled the show for good, refusing to air the last episode, "When You Wish Upon a Weinstein" because of the episode's many references to the Jewish religion.

However, "Family Guy" has found its home on Cartoon Network's Adult Swim.

Cartoon programs have been widely considered immature and unworthy of the time and money it takes to produce them, but if that is so, how can they stir up so much public opinion?

The critics might as well face it, the cartoon carries just as much cultural clout as live action sitcoms.

Plus, there isn't anything funnier than an effeminate infant with homicidal tendencies.

Exit the 'Matrix'

Action overrides acting in final chapter of 'Matrix' saga

"Matrix Revolutions"
Movie review by Cook Jones

In "The Matrix Revolutions," the Oracle tells Neo that "Everything that has a beginning, has an end." This phrase, mirrored throughout advertisements and the movie itself, attempts to assure the audience that there will be closure. And while this will obviously play out, one must ask, "And?"

Not to be misunderstood, this is an enjoyable movie. However, enjoyment of this film has absolutely nothing to do with any emotional feeling for the characters.

There really is no point in expecting emotional attachment to this movie. This movie is a vehicle for amazing action and everything else is secondary.

The story continues from exactly where "The Matrix Reloaded" left off, so seeing this without seeing its predecessors would be a mistake.

Essentially, all of humankind is at risk of destruction. While the majority of the people of Zion prepare for a final battle, Neo must go the way he has chosen. He follows his premonitions to the machine city in attempt to stop the war, or more so, to achieve peace.

Neo really does say that all he wants is "peace." He mentions something about love, too, but really it was hard to care. This film's handling of dialog and the related emotion is just too simplistic to give it any credibility.

The theological and philosophical ideas that were so eloquently intertwined within the story of the first movie have been abandoned for "Revolutions."

The cast performs much like they have in the past movies.

Keanu Reeves' Neo does his action well, and it is clear the directors still don't trust him to say anything more than two words every time they point the camera at him.

Carrie-Anne Moss plays Trinity with an "I don't have time for this crap" attitude, which is downplayed by the lack of emotion in the role.

Morpheus returns, played by Laurence Fishburne, in a very distant manner that suggests his character may have forgotten the urgency of his situation.

Then there is Agent Smith, acted to sardonic perfection by Hugo Weaving. Weaving's performance just fits, and he provides for what is easily the most interesting dialog of the movie, in a climactic showdown with Neo.

Which is really what the movie comes down to, an expected showdown. After an exciting 14 minute battle of man vs. machine at Zion, the audience knows that Neo must fight his antithesis, Agent Smith.

The following fight scene involves spectacular fighting and some amazing slow motion photography work that really helps bring this movie's tail end into focus.

This fight occurs toward the end of the movie, and for all intents and purposes, it is the end. Afterwards, a poor sequence defines the literal end, in a very unnecessary way.

"The Matrix Revolutions" is a decent film. The action is still genre defining, and it provides a recourse for the large pacing errors of this movie. "Revolutions," in the most literal sense, provides a satisfying end to the trilogy. Just don't expect a movie anywhere near as good as the first.

Dido's 2nd album gets a little too comfortable

"Life For Rent"
Album review by Matthew Webber

In a new song, "Don't Leave Home," Dido tells us how to listen:

"Close the blinds and shut the door... If you're cold I'll keep you warm/If you're low, just hold on."

"Life For Rent," Dido's follow-up to the multiplatinum "No Angel," is as cozy and warm as a favorite blanket. If it isn't very exciting, it certainly is comfortable. So close the blinds, shut the door and let it envelop you on a crisp, autumn, Sunday afternoon. If you're low, just hold on to that voice.

Still cold? Don't worry. On album-closer "See the Sun," Dido sings, "I promise you you'll see the sun again." As she lilts and coos from note to note, her voice embodies sexiness. It's a trick she perfected on "Thank You," and I've thought about her voice on rainy days ever since.

Her songwriting, unfortunately, isn't always so inviting. Her overall production, in fact, leaves me chilly.

Dido and her co-producer and brother, Rollo Armstrong, from the trip-hop group Faithless, have crafted the same type of radio-friendly soundscapes as found on "No Angel" – or really, the very same tracks.

They key word here is "crafted," rather than "created" or "felt inspired to write," because genre-wise, "Life For Rent" hasn't strayed much from Dido's original blend of drum-'n'-bass-'n'-songbird. Unlike a favorite blanket, this actually disappoints me.

On "No Angel," Dido understood relationships on a near-psychic level, capturing the minutiae of the worst and best days of her life. She was precise. She was hunter and hunted. She presented her lover with bath towels and anticipated his turning the doorknob.

"Thank You" was lovely enough for VH1 and twisted enough for Eminem to sample. Although its inevitable denouement, "White Flag," is an equally euphoric hit, it's stands out on "Life For Rent" by its not being bland.

In "Stoned," Dido's airy melodies float high above the placid guitar work and earthy percussion that Sarah McLachlan first perfected. But her lyrics reflect a lack of reflection, as she rhymes "drunk" with "desolate" and "you" all too often with "you."

Later, the clever "Mary's In India," while her ex-boyfriend is in Dido's bed, and the anthemic "This Land Is Mine" redeem the record. But the damage, my indifference, is already done.

On those Sunday afternoons when her voice dissolves around me, her lyrics too quickly disappear. Although her voice is completely enchanting, her album is merely comfortable.

Love at the airport

During a long wait at Los Angeles International Airport, British writer-director Richard Curtis was so struck by the tenderness of reunions he witnessed that he incorporated montages of airport greetings into his romantic comedy "Love Actually."

The film stakes out its ground in the first moments, with real scenes of happy reunions at the Heathrow arrivals terminal. The film tracks 20 or so loosely interconnected Londoners in various stages of life and love — just before Christmas, naturally.

ONCE IN A LIFETIME PLANS A WEDDING

The Collegian's Once in a Lifetime section is planning a wedding with help from Celebrations of the Heart, GAIA Salon, and Steve's Floral. This month features the four finalists and the winning couple will be announced in December's Once in a Lifetime section. Online voting will begin today on the Collegian Web site, www.kstatecollegian.com.

Burke - Richard

The couple: Kirby Burke and David Richard. Burke is a graduate student in early childhood special education, while Richard is a senior in elementary education.
How long they have been together: Two years
Engagement Date: Feb. 14, 2003
Wedding Date: June 5, 2004, in Manhattan
Their story: Burke and Richard met in a music of elementary school teacher's class. Burke said she heard Richard sing in front of the class — she was hooked.

During each class, Burke said she would make an effort to talk to him, and by the end of the semester, the couple went on their first date to a K-State basketball game.

Following the game, Burke said she and Richard stayed up all night talking and have been inseparable ever since.

Richard said he is looking forward to marriage as a way to grow more with Burke.

"I'm looking forward to a family, making transitions, and growing up together," he said.

Lynn-Stohs

The couple: Kelly Lynn and Aaron Stohs. Lynn is a 2000 K-State alumna, while Stohs is a 2000 K-State graduate in animal science and a senior in veterinary medicine.
How long they have been together: Six years
Engagement Date: June 14, 2003
Wedding Date: May 30, 2004, at First Lutheran Church in Manhattan.
Their story: Lynn and Stohs met six years ago during a club fair at the Student Union. Stohs was working at a booth and winked at Lynn as she walked by with a group of friends.

"I was trying to pick her up, and I did," Stohs said.

Stohs not only picked Lynn to join the club, but also picked her up for a future date.

Six years and several dates later, Stohs said he finally proposed to Lynn.

Lynn said after six years, she and Stohs still have fun together, which is important.

In addition, Stohs said the couple shares various future ideas.

"We have the same common goals," Stohs said. "Family is really important to us."

Moyer-Deetjen

The couple: Melissa Moyer and Christopher Deetjen. Moyer is a senior in animal science, while Deetjen is a 2002 K-State alumnus.
How long they have been together: Three years
Engagement Date: Oct. 7, 2003
Wedding Date: Summer 2004 at Walsburg Lutheran Church, Leonardville, Kan.
Their story: Moyer first met Deetjen while searching for a seat in her animal science class during her first semester at K-State. Moyer said she was surprised to find an empty seat next to an extremely cute guy (Deetjen), and decided to take advantage of the situation.

Moyer said the couple began talking and soon realized they shared mutual friends, interests, beliefs and had similar backgrounds.

Over two years later, the couple became engaged on Moyer's birthday.

Deetjen said he and Moyer decided to apply for the wedding because it sounded interesting. If picked, the couple said they aren't bothered by voters selecting various elements of the wedding — on one condition.

"It doesn't bother me, as long as it's not wild colors," Deetjen said.

Sanders-Gorden

The couple: Tricia Sanders and Joshua Gorden. Sanders is a sophomore in elementary education, while Gorden is a freshman in agricultural economics.
How long they have been together: 29 months
Engagement Date: July 22, 2003
Wedding Date: May 21, 2004, in the Union Courtyard
Their story: Sanders and Gorden met while working in Lawrence, wrapping hot dogs for a concession stand at a youth sports park.

"He was my supervisor, and at first we did not like each other at all," Sanders said.

Sanders said eventually the couple began to talk, which turned into numerous phone calls and dates.

Two years later, Sanders and Gorden find themselves engaged and ready to get married.

"I look forward to coming home to him," Sanders said.

Sanders said following their wedding, she and Gorden plan to live in the Manhattan area and in the future raise their family as K-Staters.

Couples share engagement stories

Proposals full of uncertainty, then love

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A walk on the beach. A holiday surprise.

Each one was the perfect engagement for our four couples selected as finalists for the Collegian's Once in a Lifetime Plans a Wedding.

David Richard, senior in elementary education, said his decision to propose to fiancee Kirby Burke, graduate student in early childhood special education, was earlier than even he had planned.

"I had bought the ring three months earlier and I was going to wait until May," Richard said. "The lady at the jewelry store even told me I wouldn't be able to wait."

Richard decided to ask the big question on Valentine's Day after Burke finished her student teaching for the day.

For the engagement, Richard lit 200 candles throughout Burke's apartment and created three color-coordinated string paths that led to a card.

In each card, Richard said he placed puzzle pieces that together formed a heart. Burke went through each path and at the end of the last one, Richard had an empty ring box waiting for her.

"I opened the ring box and it was empty," Burke said. "I was then thinking it was not a very funny joke."

Richard, however, was waiting for Burke's answer on one knee, ring in hand.

After about six years of dating, Aaron Stohs, senior in veterinary medicine, said he finally decided to propose to his fiancee, Kelly Lynn, K-State alumna, this summer at a friend's wedding in Key West, Fla.

Following a day of snorkeling and para-sailing, the couple took a walk on the beach and Stohs said it was the perfect time for the proposal.

"I smiled, and without a moment's hesitation said, 'Yes, I will marry you.'"

Melissa Moyer
SENIOR IN ANIMAL SCIENCE

Stohs asked another couple to take a picture of him and Lynn as the sun was setting. During the picture, Lynn received a surprise.

"I got down on one knee and asked her to marry me," Stohs said. "There was probably about a thousand people in the crowd."

The engagement of Melissa Moyer, senior in animal science, and Christopher Deetjen, 2002 alumnus, has a special significance – Deetjen proposed on Moyer's birthday.

"I decorated her whole apartment and when she woke up, she had a house full of balloons and streamers," Deetjen said.

Moyer said she awoke to find Deetjen on the side of her bed on both knees with a box in hand, and knew what was going on.

"I smiled, and without a moment's hesitation said, 'yes I will marry you,'" Moyer said.

The couple continued their engagement days later when Deetjen surprised Moyer with a horse-drawn buggy ride and a candlelight dinner in the woods.

Joshua Gorden, freshman in agricultural economics, decided to propose to his fiancee Tricia Sanders, sophomore in elementary education, while they were on vacation with his family this summer.

"We were on vacation with his entire extended family," Sanders said. "One night he took me down to the beach – it was the first time I saw the ocean – and he proposed."

Sanders said although the couple had been discussing marriage, the engagement was a shock.

"I wasn't really expecting it," she said.

Planning a wedding is team effort

Bride, groom, families take part in details

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Planning a wedding sometimes takes an entire team.

"My mom and my sisters have played a huge role," Jennifer Kampling, senior in elementary education, said. "I can't imagine doing it without them."

While Kampling is planning her Jan. 17 wedding from Manhattan, much of the work has to be done in St. Mark, Kan., about two hours from Manhattan, where her wedding will take place.

She said it would be too difficult to do everything alone, and her family has played a vital role in assisting her.

Her fiance, though, hasn't just been sitting and waiting for the big day.

"He picked the tuxes and found his friends' addresses," she said of her fiance, Mark McFadden, senior in finance.

The dress shopping and many of the details wouldn't appeal to McFadden, she said, especially when she prefers to spend lots of time choosing the different aspects of her wedding.

Candice Cottrell, senior in marketing, said her fiance, Evan Walton, senior in construction science, has been a great help in getting out their invitations, which currently litter the floor of her apartment.

"I address them, and he stuffs them," she said.

Cottrell's and Walton's mothers both have been involved in the planning process as well, which has been invaluable to the couple.

"It's nice to deal with moms who don't inject their opinion too much and then support whatever I decide," she said. "I couldn't have a better situation."

Jolie Flavin, senior in secondary education, is getting married May 29. She said most of the big decisions were made, and only details remained.

"We discuss, and then one of us actually carries it out," she said.

Flavin became engaged to Alex Darby in November 2002 , so she said they have had plenty of time to plan.

Still, without a team effort, it would be impossible to iron out all the details of the wedding before it's time to walk down the aisle.

"One person just doesn't have that much time."

Early planning, budgeting important for receptions

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"The Way You Look Tonight," "Butterfly Kisses," "Keeper of the Stars" and "At Last" are among the top songs played at wedding receptions, Jenne Andrews, owner of Premiere Events, said.

Andrews said couples are having more receptions at banquet halls with caterers, alcohol and a DJ.

Tropical, country western, Victorian and hearts, lace and flowers are among the top themes for reception, Andrews said. She said the reception's theme should go along with the wedding's theme.

Andrews said it is important for a couple to visualize what they want their reception to look like. She said this is usually not a problem, but figuring out how to get what they want can be.

"Usually they know what they want but they don't know how to make that happen," she said.

Andrews said it is important for a couple to look at what their budget is and decide on how much time they have to plan the reception.

Andrews said most receptions average at about $6,000 depending on the location and the number of people invited.

Planning early is very important, Andrews said.

"Start as early as you're engaged, especially in Manhattan," she said. "If you want your first location, you probably need a year to plan."

KSU Gardens offers its facilities for receptions, although the scenery comes with an alcohol-free policy.

The price to reserve KSU Gardens varies, said director Scott McElwain, because many of services offered can be provided through other outside sources.

The gardens generally serve as host to two to three weddings each year, but there are 14 weddings scheduled for next semester, Diana Edmonds, gardens secretary, said.

"We are fairly new, and some people don't know we're out here," she said.

More information is available by visiting the gardens on Denison Avenue.

Jacob Gunn, senior in secondary education, is planning his wedding reception with his fiance, Jamie Fink.

Gunn and Fink are planning an afternoon reception at the Hotel Phillips in downtown Kansas City, Mo. They will be serving hors d'oeuvres and a there will be a sandwich buffet.

Gunn said the reception will cost around $5,000. They are finding ways to save money on the reception.

"The DJ is one of our friends and our menu selection is a way to save money," he said.

Scott Bennington, senior in finance and family financial planning, is saving money on his reception by having it at the Derby High School Reception Hall in Derby, Kan. He and his fiancee, Rachel West, senior in human resources and marketing, are only paying $25 to rent the hall. Bennington said with all of the food, cake and decorations, the reception still will cost around $3,000.

Bennington said they will not be serving alcohol or having a band or DJ. He said their wedding is more of a religious celebration.

"We want to make it a celebration of God bringing us together," he said.

Couples outline lists of wedding gifts

Registry with stores becoming more common

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A giant wishlist – and all you have to do is devote your life to someone.

Gift registries have become a common part of getting married, and some K-State couples have taken advantage of the opportunity to outline what gifts they would like for their weddings.

"It was a lot of fun," Jolie Flavin, senior in secondary education, said. "We planned ahead, compromised a lot and just tried to make each other happy."

Flavin is getting married May 29 to Alex Darby, senior in civil engineering. The couple has registered at Target, Wal-Mart, and Bed, Bath and Beyond.

"It was a full day," Darby said. "We sat down and made a list, which helped a lot."

Davin Markley, assistant manager at Pier 1 Imports, said couples register for everything from furniture to dishes and decorations.

"We tell them to put everything on there," Markley said. "They can always return it if they change their minds later."

About 50 to 80 percent of each couple's list generally is purchased for them by their guests, Markley said.

Pier 1 also offers a discount so the couple can purchase additional items they did not receive as gifts, he said.

Sometimes couples receive gifts they didn't ask for, but Markley said he tries to prevent that from happening.

"I try to encourage people to stick to the registry," he said.

"Sometimes I have to remind them they're not the ones picking it out."

Darby said he would not be opposed to one of his guests straying from the list, as long as they do it carefully.

"It'd be nice if they'd stick to it, but it'd be fine if it had more personal meaning," he said.

Jennifer Kampling, senior in elementary education, said she and her fiance went into their gift registry experience without a definite plan.

"We walked up and down every aisle," she said.

Kampling picked out most of the kitchen utensils, while her fiance, Mark McFadden, senior in finance, chose many of the tools.

Their primary discussions were over which dishes and cups, Kampling said.

The purpose of a gift registry, Darby said, is to avoid getting repeat gifts. A couple can register for one brand of an item, and the store's national network can be used to ensure that only one of each item is purchased for the couple.

"I'd like to avoid getting three styles of Crock Pots," he said.

Wedding stress can be avoided with a little extra planning

Expect some troubles, but plan for the best

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Will everyone show up on time?" "Will the pictures turn out right?" "Is Aunt Jill going to be sober?"

These questions could make anyone stressed about their wedding day.

Chris Bernuth, psychology intern at University Counseling Services, said there are several stress-relieving tips that couples can use.

"Do the planning. Do not wait until last minute. Do the footwork ahead of time. Make a list of short-term goals, set and keep with these goals. Communicate well with everyone involved so there isn't guessing with what's involved with finances and travel. A big thing to worry about is exercise. Don't neglect yourself during these times. Don't slack off. Remember to stay on normal routines and practice your faith," Bernuth said.

Bernuth was married last May, and said there were several things he did to relieve stress.

"We supported talking about our feelings, we confided in people about our concerns, but also shared joy along the way. Although it is a good stress, it is still a form of stress, so it proves to be harmful. We made sure to stay healthy along the path of planning for the big day," Bernuth said.

Bernuth said there are many reasons people get anxious about wedding planning.

"The whole expectation surrounding the wedding causes a lot of the stress. Especially for the women, because it was something they were groomed to look forward to since they were little. Just the pressure for things to go off without any trouble," Bernuth said.

He said couples should expect some troubles on their wedding day.

"Allow for snafoos, set yourself up knowing you can't control all outcomes. Have a good overall expectation of the wedding, though," Bernuth said.

Bernuth said some couples choose to speak with pastors or seek professional help in the form of pre-marriage counseling.

"Get as much trouble out of the way before hand and live the day to its fullest, because it goes by fast," Bernuth said.

Christiana Cooper, senior in kinesiology, and her fiance, Clint West, plan to get married Dec. 27.

Cooper said the stress associated with the marriage is normal.

"I think that since I'm a girl, it's filled up my mind so much since I was little and now I am stressing out about it," Cooper said.

Cooper said that to relieve stress for the big day, she does quite a bit of planning.

"I make a lot of lists of what to get done, had lots of bridesmaids help to do stuff. The big thing is having the whole wedding planned before the actual date," Cooper said.

Cooper said she and West have gotten a lot of pointers as to what can go wrong.

"Knowing the things that could happen, we can do things to prevent it. Things could go wrong, but everyone has had to experience the screw ups," Cooper said.

"The whole expectation surrounding the wedding causes a lot of stress. Especially for the women, because it was something they were groomed to look forward to since they were little."

Chris Bernuth
PSYCHOLOGY INTERN AT UNIVERSITY COUNSELING SERVICES

Cari Jensen, senior in kinesiology and pre-health, and her fiance, Craig Smith, are planning a July 31 wedding.

Jensen said between playing volleyball and trying to plan a wedding, she gets stressed out easily and doesn't have much time.

"It's a big weight off my shoulders to have the big planning things out of the way, but is a little depressing I can't do much more quickly enough," Jensen said.

Jensen said when the volleyball team goes on road-trips, she brings bridal magazines along to plan in her spare time.

"All of the girls get involved with looking at stuff," Jensen said.

Jensen said with limited spare time, her first chance to get really involved is the upcoming weekend.

"We plan on going to search for a wedding dress this weekend since I haven't had a free weekend in a while," Jensen said.

Winter weddings have benefits, change from normal wedding dates

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One aspect of winter weddings never changes –the colors.

Jennifer Bibben, associate at Weisner's Sew Unique and Bridal Boutique, said colors for wedding themes change with the seasons.

"Cranberry is popular, now even on bridal gowns as accents and trims on the bride's dress, but it looks good for winter. Dark purple, a kind of amethyst, is now popular, too. Navy is, sometimes, but reds are by far the most popular winter colors," Bibben said.

Bibben said that although the colors might change, styles rarely differ.

"Strapless dresses and spaghetti straps are worn for all seasons, some come with shawls, and they might wear it depending on how much they'll be in the elements. Style doesn't change a lot from the different seasons," Bibben said.

Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral, said flower choices are different from summer weddings.

"The most popular flower is the rose for winter, usually reds and whites. Burgandies are a popular color again, more of what you'd consider the dark undertones that are associated with winter are chosen for flowers," Medlin said. "A lot of the more premium flower bouquets, the traditional bouquets with orchids and lillies, have been really popular for winter. There's also been a lot of brides that like handtie bouquets because it looks so natural."

Medlin said transporting flowers for weddings in the winter isn't a problem.

"We make sure the flowers are very well protected, wrapped up for little exposure and that the van is heated up and ready. Low exposure to the cold air means no problems," Medlin said.

"We do have concerns about people getting in an accident, especially if they have to travel a long way. We would much rather see someone not come because of weather than seeing someone get hurt."

John Jost
SENIOR IN AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS

Tory Hecht, senior in agricultural economics, and her fiance, John Jost, senior in agricultural economics, graduate in May. They are planning a Jan. 3 wedding. Hecht said they chose a winter wedding so they won't be in the middle of graduation and wedding plans.

They chose silver and cranberry as their wedding colors.

Hecht said lots of people might not choose to have winter weddings for fear of inclement weather.

"People may be afraid of a snowstorm because they may be afraid people won't come because of weather. We aren't too concerned. If it's going to be that way, it will have to be that way," Hecht said.

Jost agreed with Hecht's worries about bad weather.

"We do have concerns about people getting in an accident, especially if they have to travel a long way," Jost said.

"We would much rather see someone not come because of the weather than seeing someone get hurt."

Hecht said that although she enjoys winter weather for her wedding, she looks forward to the honeymoon, even though she doesn't know where it is.

"All I know is, it's warm, south of the border, and that I need a swimsuit and a passport," Hecht said.

Christiana Cooper, senior in kinesiolgy, is engaged to Clint West.

Their wedding date is set for Dec. 27.

Cooper and West selected dark cranberry, charcoal gray and plum as their colors.

Cooper said the reasons for a winter wedding are numerous.

"My mom wanted me to graduate first, and it helps that the church and reception are decorated since it's only two days after Christmas. I think winter is a very pretty time," Cooper said.

"Everyone gets married in the summer. Every weekend there was someone's wedding or anniversary. It must be out of convenience for a lot of people, but we just didn't see it working for us, our date is unique to Clint and I," Cooper said.

Cooper said there are a few disadvantages to her December wedding.

"It could have been more convenient in May or June. We both would have graduated already and have a steady income and a place to live," Cooper said.

Democrat outlines strategy for Iraq

By Jennifer Holland
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ORANGEBURG, S.C. – Democrat Wesley Clark, the retired general-turned-presidential candidate, offered his strategy Thursday to prevail in Iraq and bring home U.S. troops, including reconfiguring military forces in the Persian Gulf nation.

Outspoken in his criticism of President Bush's policies, Clark proposed a four-prong plan that also calls for more foreign help, giving the Iraqis a stake in the country's success and rebuilding partnerships with European allies.

Clark said even though he opposed sending troops to Iraq, they must stay to finish the job. "You cannot measure success by the size of the force," he said.

"A reduction doesn't mean you're succeeding and an addition doesn't mean you're failing."

Traveling to the military-rich state – South Carolina has scores of defense installations and 420,000 veterans – Clark said his Iraq plan draws on his experience leading NATO forces in Kosovo.

Clark would transform the U.S. occupation into a NATO operation led by the U.S. forces.

A civilian from an allied nation would guide reconstruction, taking over the job from the U.S. chief administrator, L. Paul Bremer.

On the military front, Clark would shut Iraqi borders, rebuild the Iraqi military and send in more intelligence officers and troops to guard weapons dumps. He said Iraqis should have more control of their future–including responsibility for drafting a constitution and control of oil revenues.

Finally, Clark would create a new Atlantic Charter that would stipulate that although the United States will not give up the right to act alone, working together with European allies should be the first option.

Rival Joe Lieberman, campaigning in Florida, said Clark's plan bears a striking resemblance to the one he proposed earlier this year that called for a civilian, preferably someone from an Arab nation, to lead the reconstruction.

"About a month or so ago I welcomed Wes to the Democratic party and to this campaign, so I guess I should welcome him today to my plan," Lieberman said.

During his stop in South Carolina, Clark visited the family of the third soldier from Orangeburg-Wilkinson High School to die in Iraq before addressing a predominantly black crowd of 300 people at South Carolina State University.

Clark said he knew the community was hurting and what it means to sacrifice a life for our country.

"We are all grateful for his service and we should honor it today," Clark said of 22-year-old Army Spc. Darius Jennings, who was killed Sunday when a CH-47 Chinook helicopter was shot down in the deadliest single strike against U.S. forces since the war began.

Scholarship benefit raises money for jazz students

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Matt Betton scholarship has existed since the early 1960s, but Saturday night, the benefit concert will be like no other.

Popular Jazz artists the Dukes of Dixieland and Marilyn Maye will play at the benefit. Both musical talents are friends of Betton.

Betton died about a year ago, and this is the first benefit since his death.

Bill McFarland, executive director for the International Association for Jazz Education in Manhattan, said the Dukes of Dixieland are popular jazz musicians in New Orleans, La. He said the Dukes are "arguably the most famous group in existence in New Orleans. They play six nights a week on a boat. They attend concerts and symphonies and are Grammy-nominated.

"The owner of the Dukes is a friend of Matt's. He told me 15 years ago that when Matt moved on to the jazz ensemble in the sky, he would donate the Dukes of Dixieland to play for this event," McFarland said.

Martha Kuhlman, executive assistant for the IAJE, said Maye's performance at the benefit concert is reminiscent of her close ties with Betton.

"Marilyn started her singing career with Matt Betton as a young girl. Someone told Matt that she could sing, so he invited her on stage to sing with his band in Topeka, Kan., and they maintained a close relationship. She's now coming to the benefit concert and playing at her own expense," Kuhlman said.

Betton was an adjunct faculty member for the music department and was instrumental in starting the KSU Marching Band. The band's version of the K-State fight song was played on WIBW news for years, said Mike Harders, assistant director of development for arts and sciences.

"Betton started the jazz ensemble at KSU and was responsible for the many great things they did in the first years of their existence. From the late 1930s to the mid-1970s, his own band was popular. In 1941, they were the number-one dance band in America," Harders said.

Prior to the concert, there will be a dinner at 5:30 p.m., but McFarland said it's sold out.

"Although the dinner is sold out, the memorial service is still open to the public. It is at 1:30 at All Faiths Chapel, the concert is at 8 p.m. in Union Forum Hall and costs $30, because it is to support scholarships," McFarland said.

McFarland said the benefit money will be separated into two funds: the Matt Betton scholarship, which provides for students studying jazz in K-State's music department and the IAJE scholarship for jazz students in summer study.

McFarland said part of the scholarship money goes to the IAJE because Betton was the founding executive director for the organization that was started in 1968. He said there now are more than 10,000 members in 40 countries.

"Matt began and was the original founder for the organization. He had always donated part of his scholarship donation to the IAJE," McFarland said.

Harders said the benefit is a celebration of Betton's life and importance to K-State.

"Matt was an incredible person and friend to Kansas State University," Harders said.

WOMEN
Freshmen, vets work together

"Last year we were getting more reps than we are this year," Wecker said. "But it's definitely going to help us in the long run. I won't say I like sitting on the bench, but it's nice to call on people when needed."

That's not to say, however, the freshmen didn't show signs of what's to come.

"I was staying up thinking about it last night," freshman guard Twiggy McIntyre said after the game. "But as soon as you step on the floor, all those feelings go."

If McIntyre was nervous, she didn't show it.

The 5-foot-5 freshman lit up the Lady Blues in her opener, hitting 2-of-4 three pointers and scoring 11 points – joining incumbents Wecker, Laurie Koehn and Nicole Ohlde in double figures.

Fellow freshmen Claire Coggins scored six points off two three-pointers, and played 15 minutes – one of nine players to play more than 10 minutes in the game.

"We were talking about it before we came," McInyre said. "(Claire) said, 'I just want to hear my name, Twiggy. I just want them to say Claire Coggins for three.'

"It sends chills up your spine. You just want to make it so you can hear it."

Seeing the freshmen mix with the veterans, Patterson said, is exactly what she wanted the first night out.

"It was an opportunity to get them on the floor and get acquainted," Patterson said. "I feel like we'll be confident going to the bench for a few minutes, but I don't think we'll go to the bench 20 minutes a pop from here on out."

ROWING | At home Saturday

"It's been a big in-state competition since both schools have had varsity rowing," Assistant Coach Paula Donald said. "There will be a little bit of bragging rights involved."

Novice coach James Rawson said he agrees the rivalry between the schools is important.

"There is definitely going to be a lot of pride on the line for this one," he said.

For Sweeney, this will be his first time to see the rivalry between K-State and KU.

"I won't get a sense of the rivalry until I experience it, but I assume it is like most school rivalries," Sweeney said.

At the Head of the Des Moines in Iowa City, Iowa, K-State's Varsity A eight beat KU by 55 seconds. The Wildcat's Novice A eight finished just ahead of the Jayhawks by two seconds.

"We expect them to race fairly tight," Sweeney said.

The showdown also features shorter distances. In their first two fall regattas, the Wildcats competed in 5,000 meter races. Against Kansas, the two varsity eights and four novice eights will race 2,000 meters.

"Since the race is only 2,000 meters, it will be a sprint instead of an endurance race," Donald said.

Although Sweeney is confident in his crews, the change of weather has forced them to lose time on the water.

"The winds have blown off five or six workouts. It's not the best way to prepare, but I am fairly confident in where they are and how they are doing," Sweeney said.

Rawson said there are still a number of things the crews can do on land to prepare.

"We've been doing campus runs, indoor rowing and a lot of cardio work," Rawson said.

The Sunflower Showdown will be the last regatta this fall for the Wildcat crews before heading into winter training.

"We hope to finish the fall season strong and by doing well it will help give us motivation for when we compete again in March," Donald said.

BASKETBALL | Wooldridge criticizes Cats' game

"(We looked) pretty ragged offensively. Obviously the turnovers were a big part of the game, both halves," Wooldridge said. "We showed flashes of pretty good basketball and then we'd deteriorate."

Eleven Cats entered the game, including six who made their debut, but two notable players were seen on the bench not suited up.

Jarrett Hart, a senior guard who averaged 7.5 points per game last season, was serving a suspension related to a DUI arrest in September, while Dramane Diarra, a transfer from Cloud County (Kan.) Community College, is awaiting a ruling from the NCAA on his eligibility.

Wooldridge said Hart could rejoin the team soon.

"You can term him day-to-day," Wooldridge said. "We keep evaluating his commitment to doing the right things as a student and as a person. There's no long range plan. We're going to do the right thing by him, and we're going to do the right thing by the program."

K-State's Tim Ellis fires a pass around EA Sports All-Stars' Cory Largent during the first half of the Wildcats' loss Thursday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN

Wooldridge couldn't say when he expected Diarra back, though. He said the 6-foot-8 inch forward is awaiting confirmation from the NCAA due to a club basketball team he played on in his native France.

After losing three starters, it was expected K-State would be forced to lean on its incoming talent. But for long stretches Thursday night, three, four and even five newcomers had the floor.

"That was a long time ago, when we worked together day to day," Snyder said of their relationship, and edge that may give K-State. "I think it's a very general knowledge right now."

McCarney has struggled against his former colleague. He has never beaten the Wildcats and has been outscored 156-20 in the last three games.

The closest call in the series came in 1999, when Iowa State led 28-7 at halftime before the Cats came roaring back to win, 35-28.

Still, quarterback Ell Roberson said guarding against overlooking the Cyclones is something that has everybody on edge. The Wildcats were sluggish in a 38-10 win over an overmatched Baylor team last Saturday.

"I think it's good it happened like it did," Roberson said. "Now we can go out and prepare real hard for this team. Baylor threw everything at us and now we have to come out fired up, and know they could beat us if we don't play our game."

The Cyclones have lost six games in a row, including a shutout two weeks ago to Nebraska – but that's still not enough to set Snyder at ease.

After losing three consecutive games – including conference openers against Texas and Oklahoma State – the Wildcats have rattled off three straight wins, outscoring their opponents 129-36 during that stretch.

"I'm not sure this group of guys ever lost their confidence," Snyder said. "Is it at a different level than it was? Perhaps so, but I think losing ballgames isn't a cause for depleting your level of confidence."

The Cats also will be looking to become bowl eligible. Because of NCAA rules regarding 13-game regular seasons, and having two Division-IAA opponents, K-State must win eight games to qualify.

But K-State is playing for much more than a bowl game Saturday. The Wildcats still maintain control of their own destiny, and wins over Iowa State, Nebraska and Missouri would grant the Cats their first Big 12 North title since 2000.

For Indianola, Iowa, native Antoine Polite, this weekend's homecoming means more than just playing in front of family and friends.

"We do things the right way, we play hard this week and have a good week of practice, and keep going through we'll be in good shape," he said. "Destiny's in our hands."

K-State teams up with Solomon

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Solomon University is now in session.

K-State Salina faculty and students are helping out in the Solomon school district's after-school program – Solomon University.

This is the first year for the program, which is a result of a grant the district received. The grant is designed to fund the program for five years.

The school district, located 13 miles east of Salina, added the program this school year for 15 students in fifth through eighth grade.

The program is divided into four sections, with one section per quarter. Each section covers different material.

The first nine-week session focused on service learning with Patricia Ackerman, instructor in the arts, science and business program.

Ackerman said she invited students in her expository writing class to take part in the Solomon program. Most did participate, she said.

"The overall benefit is the opportunity for elementary students to work with college students," she said.

Ackerman said she would like to meet with other participating instructors to share experiences.

"I'm hoping there will be a reflection time at the end of the year where we can expand the opportunities at K-State and Solomon," she said.

The nine-week session in progress is led by Pedro Leite, assistant professor of engineering technology.

Leite will be leading a project involving students building a robot and writing a program.

The programming will be kept simple, but students still have to debug programs, he said.

"It's the first time I will be working with that young of an age," he said. "It's a very simple language if you give them proper instructions."

The third session will be based on aviation and be directed by Jim Splichal, assistant professor in K-State Salina's aviation program.

He will teach students about aviation history, careers in aviation and aerodynamics.

Students will have a race to see which mylar balloon will rise to the ceiling the slowest. To do this, they will have to figure out how much weight the balloon will lift and still rise.

"It's not how fast you go, it's how slow you go," he said. "It's a case of timing the balloon to rise in the race."

They will be taking three field trips to K-State Salina, Splichal said. The first trip will be a campus tour, and they will tour the classrooms and simulators. On the second visit they will work on flight planning. There will be a demonstrations of the weather computer and of pre-flight aircraft and aircraft safety.

The final trip will be for the Experimental Aircraft Association's program called Young Eagles' Flight. They will conduct demonstration flights for the students.

Local craft show employs volunteers to benefit Manhattan Catholic Schools

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Roma Keller helps pay for her child's K-State tuition by selling the baskets she weaves.

The Manhattan resident said she weaves more than 50 different styles of baskets. Each is hand-woven, and they are all unique, she said.

She makes baskets for keys, remote control holders and silverware holders – baskets people can use over the years, she said.

Some of her work will be on display at the 23rd annual Buttons and Bows Craft Fair on Saturday. She found out about the fair through her daughter, a K-State student.

"They have volunteers that are there to greet you, and they have a good clientele as far as coming to the shows," she said.

Rebecca Frakes, chairperson of Buttons and Bows, said the show is ran strictly by volunteers who make the show a success.

"There are about 125 parent volunteers and 25 to 40 junior high volunteers," she said.

"Buttons and Bows wouldn't be the success that it is without the parents of Manhattan Catholic Schools that volunteer their time and talent," she said. "I think Manhattan people look forward to it each year, and we see a lot of citizens that come to it."

The show is a fund-raiser for MCS's Parent-Teacher Organization, Karen Marsh, contract coordinator, said.

"It goes toward the teacher's wish list and what is most needed for the school, whether that is computer updating or new playground equipment," she said.

The show features a variety of hand-made crafts by more than 125 different crafters, Marsh said. Some of them have traveled from Kansas City and Nebraska.

Marsh said there will be merchants who specialize in quilts, jewelry, wood working, metal working, basket weaving and much more.

There will be an admission price, but customers will be entered into a raffle with admission, Marsh said.

"Admission is one dollar but that makes you eligible for a hand-made quilt or a hand made rocking horse," she said. "As a customer, you have a choice of where you want your ticket to be placed."

Marsh said about 3,000 people usually attend, and last year they raised over $15,000.

TROOPS | 85,000 soldiers will be activated in January 2004

That measure, known in the military as "stop-loss," does not apply to the Marine Corps, which said it will dispatch about 20,000 Marines to replace the Army's 82nd Airborne Division in western Iraq, including the Fallujah area where anti-occupation violence has been strongest.

Lt. Gen. Jan C. Huly, deputy commandant of the Marine Corps for plans and operations, told a news conference that the Marines would spend seven months in Iraq, then be replaced by another 20,000-Marine contingent for seven months. They will come from the 1st Marine Division, based at Camp Pendleton, Calif., which helped spearhead the invasion of Iraq last spring.

The Army will send the equivalent of three combat divisions to replace the four there now.

The rotation, combined with a switchout of troops in Afghanistan – the 25th Infantry Division replacing the 10th Mountain Division in April – is the largest sequence of troop movements for the Army since World War II, Lt. Gen. Richard Cody said in an interview.

IRAQ | Death toll climbs to 254; 140 killed since major combat's end

Elsewhere, one U.S. soldier from the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment was killed Thursday when his truck hit a land mine near the Husaybah border crossing point with Syria nearly 200 miles northwest of Baghdad, the military said.

A paratrooper from the 82nd Airborne Division was killed and two others were wounded when their patrol came under rocket-propelled grenade and small arms fire near Mahmudiyah, 15 miles south of Baghdad late Wednesday, the military said.

Their deaths brought to 140 the number of U.S. soldiers killed in Iraq by hostile fire since President Bush declared an end to major combat May 1. A total of 114 U.S. soldiers were killed in action before Bush's declaration.

SENATE | Marriage resolution could be heard at Salina next week

"We may table it again because I don't want students to have to drive an hour to talk about it," he said.

Bridge is referring to the fact that next week's Senate meeting will be at K-State-Salina, and not everyone will be going. He said he wants senators to debate the resolution.

The resolution states concern of Taussig's proclamation, claiming it "excludes, alienates, degrades and stigmatizes members of our K-State and Manhattan community."

In other Senate news, guest speaker Erin Ludvicek, junior in human resources, proposed a textbook evaluation at the end of a semester that would be similar to professor evaluations. She said this would help professors determine if students were using the textbooks and if they found them helpful or relevant to course material.

Guest speaker Alex Evert, senior in agriculture technology management, proposed a contract tuition rate.

Incoming freshmen or transfer students would sign a presumable five-year contract, he said, that would bind them to a fixed tuition fee.

MIRACLE WORKER | Play performed for elementary students

Cast members had their work cut out for them when they performed at the Woodrow Wilson Elementary School, which provides for all the hearing impaired children in Manhattan, Katha Hurt, principal of Woodrow Wilson, said.

Hurt said the school has three interpreters to work with six students who have various levels of hearing.

During the performance, the interpreters, standing to the right of the stage, signed the words of the characters for those hearing impaired students.

Toni Kroll, educational interpreter at Woodrow Wilson, said she could tell by their reactions that the students got a lot out of the play.

Since this was the first time the interpreters had seen the play, they had to be fast in order to relay the words without much of a delay. But this is nothing new for interpreters. Kroll said when they work in the classroom, teachers sometimes give them a copy of the lesson plans in order to prepare, but other times, such as with "The Miracle Worker" play, they are required to go impromptu.

"We never know what words are coming next," Kroll said.

Kroll said one thing many people may not realize about interpreting is that you can't just translate the words into signs verbatim – you have to stay true to the meaning. We want to translate the meaning not just the words, she said.

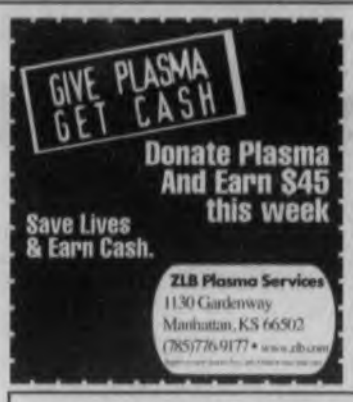
Kroll has also worked with college students, which can be a challenge.

"Trying to match the language level of who your working with can be difficult, Kroll said. "That's probably the biggest challenge of being an interpreter.

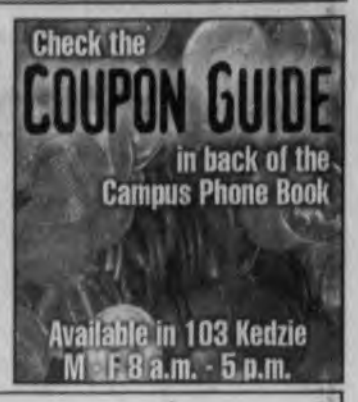
Cast members also had the challenge of facing a wide range of ages, since Woodrow Wilson includes kindergartners through sixth graders.

Hurt said she was very happy with the performance. She said that the play was probably more beneficial to the older students since the message may have been a bit advanced for first graders.

After the play, students were allowed to ask the actors questions about their characters. Hurt said she was impressed with the level of questions asked.

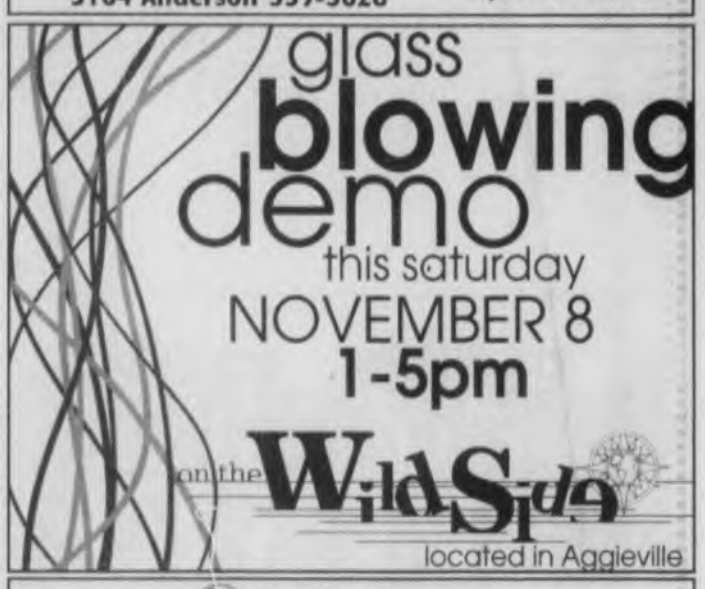


Most of the questions were directed in the first person such as, "what was it like to be deaf and blind, what was it like to be Hellen's mother, father or brother, did Helen get all of the attention because she was handicapped."



Hurt said she hoped the play would fuel discussions in the classroom about people with disabilities.

"They say it is better to teach the lesson after the field trip, this may be the case here as well," she said.



Schrader, who played Hellen, is required to sign during the play. She said knowing that part of the audience knew sign language was a little intimidating. Even with the added pressure, Schrader said she was thrilled to be part of the play.

"It is such a great experience," Schrader said. "Not only do you get to act, but also do something that benefits children."

Sproles helps lead Cats to Cyclone shutout

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

AMES, Iowa – Darren Sproles said he hasn't played any better football than he played in Saturday's 45-0 win over Iowa State.

The 230 yards of production – including 201 on the ground and three rushing touchdowns from 23, 32 and 70 yards – perhaps prove his point.

Of all his big plays, however, none stood out more than the first run of the third quarter.

"It was a huge start out of the second half," center Nick Leckey said. "It really put a statement on what this team is all about."

Coach Bill Snyder said the play may have changed the mentality and focus of the Cyclones, giving the Cats the edge they needed to become bowl eligible.

Leading 14-0 at the half, Sproles said he could not describe how he felt when he returned from the locker room.

Sometimes, actions speak louder than words.

Sproles saw "a big old hole, and hit it" straight up the middle for 70 yards, breaking open the game. Total elapsed time: 11 seconds.

"They were setting their safeties back, and he got there so fast," Michael Smith, running back coach, said. "The next thing you know, we're hoping those little legs can outrun the pursuit."

Smith said Sproles came out of the locker room upset with himself after a penalty for an illegal fair catch on a punt return late in the first half.

After the 70-yard run, Sproles said he was "in the zone," and broke into the endzone from 32 yards out five minutes later.

"You kind of have to divide the game up," Snyder said. "In special teams, he made a couple of mistakes that really shouldn't have taken place. As far as running the ball and catching a couple passes, he played like he always plays – really well."

Success in the rushing game resulted from the offensive line's ability to play together as a group, Smith said.

"Darren will be the first one to tell you, along with myself, the guys are doing a great job and today were hitting on all cylinders," he said.

Sproles' career day ended with 201 rushing yards, only the seventh Wildcat in school history to rush for more than 200 yards in a game.

By comparison, Iowa State finished with 39 yards rushing and only 140 yards of total offense.

Separating Saturday's performance from Sproles' other games was that all his numbers were compiled in exactly 37:13.

With a 35-0 lead secured midway through the third quarter, Sproles was pulled from the game.

"The thing about Darren is that he's used to playing half a game. In high school, that's what he'd play," Smith said. "Darren is a special, special person. I know people get tired of us saying that, but he is. He's a tremendous competitor. He works at it."

Sproles now has 1,300 yards rushing this season and 2,975 for his career. He is seventh all-time in Big 12 history for career rushing yards and is 25 away from becoming the seventh player in Big 12 history – and first K-State back – to rush for 3,000 yards.

Sproles is also 147 yards away from Aaron Lockett's career all-purpose yards record.

"A couple times the ball hit the ground, and that's a check mark against his performance," Snyder said. "But I can't think of very many times I would have anything negative to say about Darren's performance. He's just a very talented, good football player."

12th Fort Riley soldier killed

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

An Army officer from Michigan was killed in Iraq when his vehicle was struck by an improvised explosive device, the U.S. Department of Defense said Sunday.

Staff Sgt. Mark D. Vasquez, 35, of Port Huron, Mich., died Saturday while on patrol in Fallujah, Iraq.

He was assigned to Company A, 1st Battalion, 16th Infantry, 1st Brigade, 1st Infantry Division.

Vasquez joined the Army in April of 1993, and had been stationed at Fort Riley since October of 2002. He was assigned to the unit as a squad leader, and deployed to Iraq in September.

Vasquez is the 12th Fort Riley soldier killed while serving in Iraq.

Kansas among states to cancel primary election

By Robert Tanner
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Kansas is among several states that has moved to drop its presidential primary next year, worried about costs in still-tight financial times and wondering if the political exercise would serve any purpose.

Some states say they can't afford the millions of dollars it costs to put on an election. Others say the decisions reflect the lopsided nature of modern primaries: the front-runner gets anointed by the media and campaign donors after the first few state primaries, and the rest of the primaries are formalities.

The decisions add fuel to the argument that the primary system is in dire need of repairs. In most states forgoing a primary, party-run caucuses will be used instead to choose delegates to the national conventions.

"Fewer voters will participate because (caucuses) are more complex," said Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate. State politicians are freezing out average voters, he said, because caucuses bring "lower turnout, and more advantage to whoever's organized."

Primaries usually don't get turnout much higher than 20 percent of registered voters, but they're better than caucuses. In Missouri, the 2000 primary brought 745,000 people to the polls, while the 1996 caucus brought 20,000, the state Democratic Party said.

So far, Kansas, Colorado and Utah – all with Republican-controlled legislatures – have canceled their state-run 2004 primaries. Republican legislatures tried unsuccessfully to drop primaries in Arizona and Missouri, but Democratic governors either vetoed the primary bill or restored the funding.

Liberal comedian Al Franken satirizes conservatives at McCain

By Matthew Webber
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nobody picketed Al Franken on Friday evening.

Instead, his blend of stand-up comedy, political speech and book tour earned him a standing ovation from the capacity crowd in McCain Auditorium.

Franken, a former writer and performer for "Saturday Night Live," riffed on marriage, being Jewish and politics throughout his 90-minute performance.

Franken never masked his liberal views. A few audience members walked out of the auditorium early, but most laughed loudly at all of his jokes.

After the performance, the author of the current bestseller, "Lies and the Lying Liars Who Tell Them: A Fair and Balanced Look at the Right," signed books and posters for the dozens of audience members who waited in line, selling out his supply of books.

Franken began his performance by asking if Fred Phelps was in the audience. Franken said Phelps, the creator of the "God Hates Fags" Web site, and his group picketed him a few years ago when he performed at the University of Kansas.

When a KU student told Franken before his show about the protesters, he went outside to talk to them. Franken asked them if God really hates homosexuals. The confrontation amused Phelps, who said he thought Franken was funny, even though he disagreed with everything he represented.

This led to a series of jokes about members of the Christian Coalition, whom Franken said make his job as a comedian a lot easier.

"Thank God for Jerry Falwell," he said.

When the Jewish Franken heard Falwell say the anti-Christ was a living, Jewish male, Franken said he was curious who it was.

"I knew it wasn't me," he said.

He called White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer a

37 Americans die in Iraq

Gene J. Puskar | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
An Army honor guard carries the coffin of Sgt. Ernest Bucklew during a joint graveside service with Bucklew's mother, Mary Ellen Bucklew, at Beaver Falls Cemetery, Saturday in Beaver Falls, Pa. Bucklew, 33, was among 16 U.S. soldiers killed when a missile downed their helicopter in Iraq, Nov. 2. Bucklew was traveling home to attend his mother's funeral when the helicopter was shot down.

Staff and wire reports

Friday's crash of a Black Hawk helicopter near Tikrit brought the number of dead Americans to 37 in the month of November.

A Polish soldier also was killed in combat last week in Iraq. He was the first Pole to die in combat since the aftermath of World War II.

An attack Nov. 2 on a CH-47D Chinook helicopter near Fallujah was the worst attack of the war. The strike killed 16 American soldiers and wounded 25. It is believed an SA-7 shoulder-fired missile slammed into the chopper's engine.

GREEN RIVER KILLER CONFESSION

Seattle's Green River killer pleaded guilty to 48 murders Wednesday.

Gary Leon Ridgway picked up prostitutes, strangled them and molested their bodies, then he left them in the Green River and other dump sites around Seattle. Nearly 20 years passed before DNA evidence linked him to the crimes.

Ridgway

"Choking is what I did, and I was pretty good at it," he wrote in his statement, adding that he killed "so many women I have a hard time keeping them straight."

LOST MANHATTAN BOY FOUND

Following a 21-hour search for 10-year-old Kendal Jamal McBride, the Manhattan boy was found in a sleeping compartment of a semi-truck near Oklahoma City.

McBride was chased by a dog while he was on his paper route and climbed into the truck for safety. The trucker didn't find McBride until he stopped to eat lunch in Oklahoma.

MAKING PROGRESS

The Labor Department reported Friday that 126,000 jobs had been created in October, the biggest gain in nine months. Though this still isn't enough to combat the rising population, it represents significant progress.

A BELATED APOLOGY

Democratic presidential candidate Howard Dean apologized Wednesday for urging Democrats to court Southerners who display Confederate flags.

Dean

Dean promised to continue his fight for white Southern votes.

Dean got in trouble while defending his moderate views on gun ownership, saying Democrats need to address such cultural issues if they want to appeal to Southern white voters who drive pickup trucks with Confederate flags.

REPUBLICANS WIN ELECTIONS

Washington lobbyist Haley Barbour unseated Mississippi Democratic Gov. Ronnie Musgrove as the GOP swept both governors' races at stake Tuesday. Rep. Ernie Fletcher won in Kentucky, ousting Democrats from power after 32 years.

BUSH SIGNS ABORTION BILL

Pablo Martinez Monsivais | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
President Bush signs a bill banning partial birth abortions Wednesday in Washington.

President Bush signed into law the most far-reaching abortion restrictions in three decades Wednesday, an emotionally charged measure already challenged in the federal courts.

A federal judge in Nebraska called the law "highly suspect" and issued a temporary order blocking it from applying to four abortion-rights doctors who filed suit.

Bikers donate time to Flint Hills Breadbasket

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN
Bill Padgett, Manhattan resident, unloads food being delivered to the Flint Hills Breadbasket. The delivery was part of a food drive by A Brotherhood Against Totalitarian Enactment.

Local motorcyclists rode Sunday to take food and money to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

The bikers are members of A Brotherhood Against Totalitarian Enactment and collected the donations at the end of last week.

Nancy Woodyard, state secretary for ABATE, said they raised more than $600 in donations.

"This was a good year," she said.

ABATE members collected money at Cock and Bull, My Place Tavern and Prairie Hawg – all local establishments.

"It's all donations," Woodyard said.

"We went around to the bars on Thursday and Friday and collected money."

They also accepted nonperishable food donations, and the donated money is used by the Breadbasket to purchase perishable food items.

Shirley Brown, director of the Breadbasket, said ABATE's donations will go toward baskets made for the holiday season to give to families in need.

"The way that these baskets are made are through efforts like this," she said.

"It is the only way we are able to provide. We have a great community."

The staff knows the holiday season has started when they receive the donation from ABATE, Brown said.

"They are the first big one of the year," she said.

People who are going to need food for the holiday season sign up in advance from Nov. 1 through 10.

"When they sign up, they know they will get the food," Brown said.

"It's a comfort for them that they know they are going to be provided for."

This year there is a greater need, she said, because a lot of people are having a tough time.

People don't hear about it when a business with only three or four employees closes down.

When 20 of those businesses close down, she said the numbers start to add up.

"You don't read about it, and you don't see it," Brown said.

In the past, there have been times when the Breadbasket hasn't received many donations, she said.

However, they have always been able to stretch what they've got to provide everyone with a holiday meal.

"We practice what we preach," she said.

"We teach people to be self-sufficient, and we teach ourselves to be self-sufficient."

Cell-phone use raises academic honesty issues

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Professors around the country are finding themselves battling a digital demon.

More and more colleges are reporting the use of cellular phones with text messaging capabilities as mediums for academic dishonesty.

Alisha Peters, freshman in criminology and pre-law, said it wouldn't be challenging to cheat on class exams.

"They need more TAs supervising the exams," she said. "Classes are so big, you could just sit in the back and cheat."

Helene Marcoux, associate director of the honor system, said although the Honor Council, which handles honor code violations, has not had to deal with cell phone cheating, she does not doubt that it exists.

"I would imagine there are some students who will use technology to their favor to the disadvantage of others in their class," Marcoux said.

Harald Prins, professor of anthropology said that as technology progresses, cheaters get smarter.

"Whatever technology makes possible, people will use for negative gains," he said. "I understand people try to cut corners and cheating is an ethical shortcoming on the part of the student."

Peters said she thinks people who cheat undermine her work as a student.

"It's not fair to those who actually study, especially if there is a curve on the exam," she said.

A student caught cheating at K-State must go through 12 steps, including a hearing between the alleged violator and six members of the Honor Council. If the council finds the student in violation for cheating, he or she will get an XF in the class which indicates failure as a result of cheating.

"The student also has to try and rebuild the trust of their teachers," Marcoux said.

A student found in violation for academic dishonesty could also be required to enroll in the Academic Integrity Course, which deals with ethics and ethical decision making.

Prins said the key to eliminating cheating is stopping it before it starts.

"Prevention is so much better than punishment," he said. "We want to stop the temptation to cheat."

Marcoux said the future of cell phones in the classroom is uncertain.

"Faculty are becoming more aware of technology in the classroom," she said. "It won't be long before they are banning cell phones to lessen the probability of problems in the classroom."

TO THE POINT

Cutting costly presidential primary smart

The $1.7 million saved by eliminating the Kansas presidential primary next year is ultimately beneficial for the state economy and possibly for state politics.

As the presidential race heats up for the Democratic Party, the GOP-dominated state government of Kansas has eliminated the state-sponsored primary.

Kansas has never held much political weight in the primary process. As a small state with a late primary date, Kansas generally is a footnote in the nomination process.

Eliminating the ineffectual primary and saving the costs of sponsoring it are not the only benefits of the decision. A caucus system has the potential to invigorate Kansans to get involved with their local party officials.

While caucuses generally receive lower turnouts than the already low turnouts for primary elections, the participation levels can increase. Greater grassroots organization usually develops when people turn to their state parties to vote rather than the state-run primaries.

While the highly contentious Democratic primary is fueling interest in the 2004 presidential primaries, Kansans will still have opportunities to make their voices heard.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Lost in legalities

Wordy laws discourage civic awareness

JESSE LOEWEN

So far this semester, I have written about gun control, obscenity laws, pornography, the legislation of morality, "Bowling for Columbine" and eminent domain abuses, among others.

In the course of writing my columns, I have read a number of news sources and journals, but I usually turn to the laws and Supreme Court cases.

In my research, I have come to one conclusion regarding our legislative and court decisions – they are hard to read.

Our laws are incredibly wordy and written in a style that is difficult to follow, and they often reference or modify existing laws without explaining those modifications.

At one point I was planning on writing about the Patriot Act document, passed in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, that the ACLU and other groups claim is an unconstitutional violation of our Fourth Amendment rights.

I found the Patriot Act online. It is 342 pages long. Section 102 takes three pages to say Congress condemns discrimination against Arabs and Muslims, but it does not actually state a law.

I am all for preventing discrimination, but I do not think we need to include in a law a statement saying, "The acts of violence that have been taken against Arab and Muslim Americans since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks against the United States should be and are condemned by all Americans who value freedom."

This is especially true when the entire section specifies no consequence for this type of action, but is intended only to convey Congress' position on the matter.

Later on, the Patriot Act becomes even harder to read and more ridiculous to research.

A huge portion of the act is not new law, but revision of old law. Section 104 reads, "Section 2332e of Title 18, United States Code, is amended – (1) by striking '2332c' and inserting '2332a;' and (2) by striking 'chemical.'"

It gets worse. Section 106 replaces a semicolon and the word "and" with a comma and a statement.

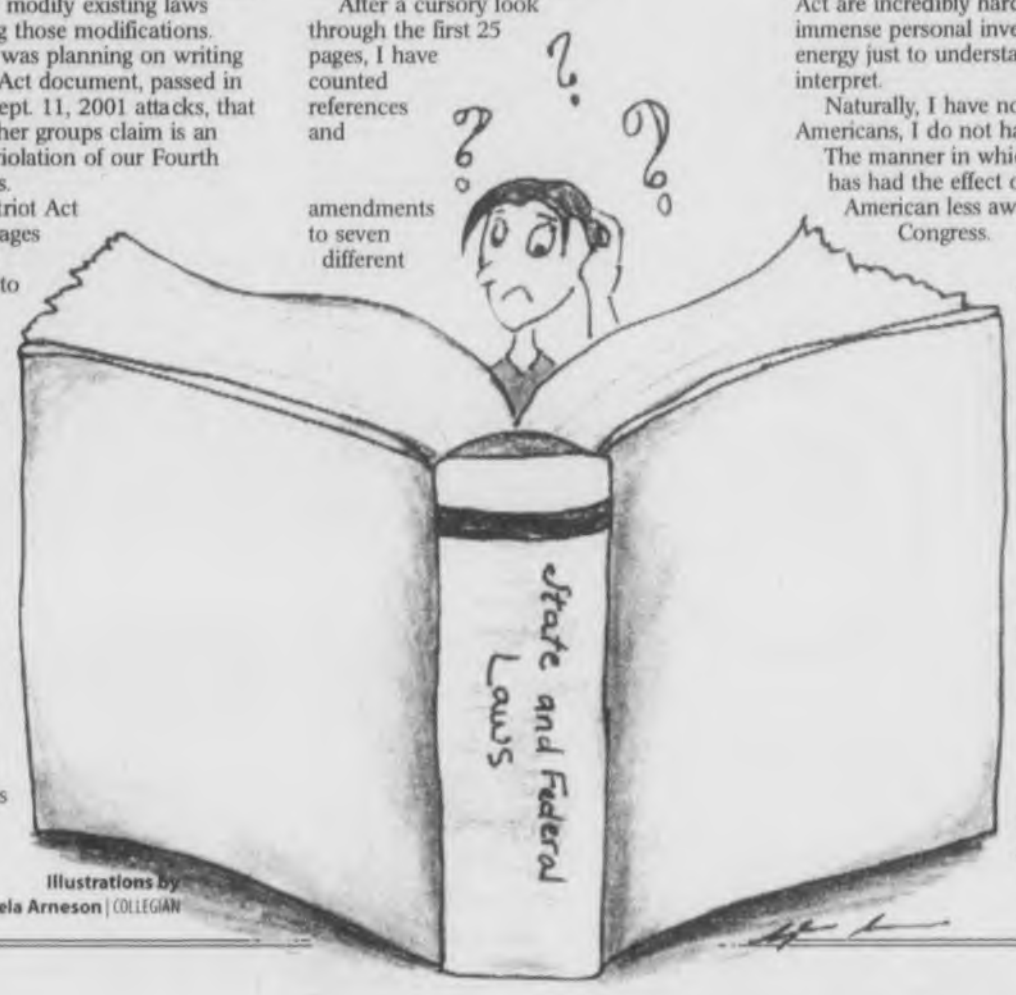
I get it. I have to look up every law referenced and amended in the Patriot Act to actually know what it does.

After a cursory look through the first 25 pages, I have counted references and amendments to seven different acts, including the International Emergency Powers Act, Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, National Security Act of 1947, Communications Act of 1934, and Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, plus several sections of the United States Code.

The revisions mentioned are things like replacing certain parts of certain sentences with different language and removing certain punctuations.

In order to make sense of what the Patriot Act does, I would have to look up pre-Patriot Act examples of every law mentioned in the act and go through them, replacing and modifying accordingly.

That is a lot of work just to figure out what one law does.



Laws written in the manner of the Patriot Act are incredibly hard to follow and require immense personal investments of time and energy just to understand, not to mention interpret.

Naturally, I have not done so. Like most Americans, I do not have the time.

The manner in which we write our laws has had the effect of making the average American less aware of what goes on in Congress.

We simply cannot afford such awareness. Jobs, school, kids and every other facet of our lives prevent us from having the necessary time to study new laws.

So, I have a law I would like to see passed – a law specifying the language, degree of clarity and length limitations that future laws must meet prior to their passage.

Censoring voices proves both harmful, unpatriotic

AMY LINK

Movies, books and music have the power to console, inspire and change us. They spark our dreams and live in our hearts.

In order for them to truly affect us, though, they have to be brutally honest, and sometimes the truth hurts people. Often censorship is used to aid those offended, but the art is lost.

Censorship is an assault to art and democracy. Last week our democracy may have been attacked.

On Nov. 4, CBS decided to pull its much anticipated miniseries, "The Reagans." The miniseries had drawn much criticism from conservatives who said the film distorted the legacy of Ronald Reagan.

CBS, however, claims it did not give in to political pressure, and the decision not to air the series was based on inaccuracies in the film.

"We believe it does not present a balanced portrayal of the Reagans for CBS and its audience," the network said.

If that is true, CBS should be commended – after all, slander is not art and should be censored. However, one has to wonder if CBS felt too threatened and backed down. Pulling a much-hyped miniseries set to run during sweeps is not normal for networks in the fight for ratings.

It would be nice to believe ethics trumped money, but for now I am skeptical.

CBS will not air "The Reagans" on its network. Instead, it will be shown on the Showtime cable network, which is owned by Viacom and CBS.

Airing the series on cable doesn't change the inaccuracies in the film. It just reduces the audience size, and consequently, the number of complaints.

The kicker to all this?

According to www.cnn.com, Viacom is awaiting federal action on rules to restrict ownership of local TV stations. Failure to enact such changes could cost Viacom millions of dollars, said Jeff Chester, head of the Center for Digital Democracy.

Chester said Viacom needs help from Republicans in the White House and Congress who might not like seeing Reagan portrayed negatively.

Maybe it wasn't censorship. Maybe CBS just didn't want to smear a president respected and beloved by many.

This is not the first time the Bush administration has flexed its "hush-up" muscle.

Earlier this year, Attorney General John Ashcroft banned print journalists from the National Constitution Center, allowing only TV journalists.

However, the biggest censorship threat has been attacks on those who don't support Bush, who are labeled as unpatriotic. War protesters have taken many hits.

Many people yell angrily at the protesters, saying "You know, if you were living in the countries we're at war with, you couldn't protest."

This is true, but then doesn't that mean they should be allowed to do so here?

Bush is big on patriotism, but true American patriotism is not waving a flag in unconditional support of your president. We love the flag because of what it stands for – a country built by the union of people from different backgrounds with different ideas.

There have always been differing ideas on how to run the government, but this is our strength, not a fault. It is this ideal of "freedom of ideas" for which Americans have died and are dying.

In a time of war, we need to support our government, but that doesn't mean people can't be critical. They have the right to ask tough questions and be negative.

Sure, negative remarks may hurt, but censoring them is not the answer. This country was built on discussions, not pep rallies.

Today, it just may be a canceled series or banning a reporter from a conference – tomorrow, it could be a ban on your favorite book, movie or song.

What happens when people become afraid to speak the truth? Is that America? Will you want to wave a flag for that place?

Remember, not only does speaking the difficult truth set you free – it is also patriotic.

Local Democratic Party seeking youth turnout at next meeting

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Less than one-fourth of students vote, on average.

Kathryn Focke, chair of the Riley County Democratic Party, said she encourages more students to participate in political activity.

"The voting average is only about 19 percent for students. We want them to be involved in the political process," she said. "We encourage Republican, Democrat and the unaffiliated to attend the meeting."

The Riley County Democratic Party is having its monthly meeting at 6 tonight at the Little Apple Brewery.

Focke said five or six students are normally present at the meetings, but all students are encouraged to attend.

The organization aims to invite all cabinet members to speak to raise awareness of and familiarize people with state officers.

Tonight, Jim Garner, Kansas Secretary of Human Resources, will speak.

"There is no particular order of speakers," Focke said. "We have had a labor leader but haven't had Garner from the cabinet yet. We're excited."

If you go

Riley County Democratic Party monthly meeting

What: Featuring speaker, Kansas Secretary of Human Resources Jim Garner
When: 6 p.m. tonight, and every second Monday of the month
Who: Open to public
Where: Little Apple Brewery Banquet Room
Cost: Dinner costs, speaker is free

Focke said Garner will speak about topics related to employment.

"He'll give some general information about minimum wage and talk about jobs within the state. Really anything dealing with employment he will hit on," she said.

Garner was minority leader of the Kansas House of Representatives, and then ran for Insurance Commissioner. When Governor Kathleen Sebelius came into office, he was appointed to the Secretary of Human Resources position.

After his speech, Garner will answer questions, Focke said.

"Jim Garner is a really interesting man with an incredible legal background," she said. "He is very intelligent, especially when it comes to labor issues."

FRANKEN | Politically minded comedian receives standing ovation

"chimp" and said President Bush has proved "there's more to being president than simply being articulate, knowledgeable and intelligent." When he mentioned Attorney General John Ashcroft, the audience booed.

Although the "Stuart Smalley" actor mostly made fun of conservative politicians and pundits, he also poked fun at the Clinton family and Al Gore.

He said he liked several Republicans, including Sen. John McCain and former Sen. Bob Dole, whose "ironic detachment" he said he finds amusing.

Franken mostly stayed behind a podium for his speech, but he strutted to the front of the stage and grabbed his crotch to imitate Bush's infamous flight suit stunt.

His monologue about sending the elderly into space to save money for both the Medicare and NASA budgets inspired some of the evening's longest laughter.

In a more serious moment, he said he feels a tide is turning in America because people are angry at the president. He said after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, the American people were more unified than he had ever seen them, but Bush squandered an opportunity to bring them together through "mutual purpose and mutual sacrifice."

"It was good to hear people speak up about lies and things that happen in the media."

Michael McCollum
SENIOR IN ARCHITECTURE

He said Bush "hijacked 9/11 for his own purposes," which included tax cuts for the rich and repeated terror warnings.

The orange terror level is "the highest level at which you're encouraged to go to the mall," he said, while with red "you're encouraged to buy online."

In addition to telling jokes, Franken advertised his book, which he said "makes a great gift."

Franken joked about the Fox News Channel lawsuit against him for infringing upon their "Fair and Balanced" trademark, which he said "was literally laughed out of court."

"The transcript reads like a play called 'The Lawyer's Nightmare,'" he said.

When he finished his speech, he asked the audience if they wanted an early start to the book-signing or a question-and-answer session. When an audience member yelled "Stuart!" Franken gave the audience a "Daily Affirmation."

Removing his glasses and walking to the front of the stage, he asked the audience to repeat after him.

"I'm good enough, I'm smart enough, and doggone it ..."

"People like me."

"And doggone it, we're gonna take this state for the Democrats."

The audience stood to cheer.

Michael McCollum, senior in architecture, said he shared some of Franken's viewpoints and that the performance was "very entertaining."

"I thought it was very interesting and definitely politically minded," he said. "It was good to hear people speak up about lies and things that happen in the media."

He said his favorite moment was when Franken discussed the Fox lawsuit.

"He knew that he had the First Amendment and that basically this was a flawed case from the beginning."

Amber Schmitt, sophomore in family life and community services and natural resources and environmental sciences, was an usher for the performance. She said she thought Franken was funny.

"He picks on everybody," she said. "It's pretty even, and pretty funny."

She said none of Franken's content surprised her.

"When you come into this kind of show, nothing really surprises you very much. You kind of expect it all to be a little kooky."

Jennifer Luck, graduate student in theater at the University of Kansas, drove to Manhattan just to see Franken. She said she liked hearing Franken's liberal viewpoints.

"I thought it was hysterical," she said. "I thought it was great. I just got through reading (Michael Moore's) 'Dude, Where's My Country?' so it's very, very similar. I really enjoyed it.

"I think the Fred Phelps stuff was probably my favorite moment, just because we get that so much in Lawrence."

PRIMARY | Tight state budgets prompt cancelation of presidential primaries, many Democrats object to move primaries hurts them especially, with their crowded field of candidates. President Bush has no challenger.

Other Democrats, however, are pushing to get rid of primaries. Maine dropped its presidential primary for next year, and New Mexico effectively did – it passed a law allowing parties to hold caucuses, and then Democratic Gov. Bill Richardson set an early Feb. 3 caucus (June primaries will go on for other elections).

Washington Gov. Gary Locke, head of the Democratic Governors Association, is calling a special session to discuss scrapping his state's primary next year.

"Why waste $7 million of scarce state money?" Locke said. Democrats in Washington state are using precinct caucuses in February to allocate national convention delegates, making the March 2 primary pointless.

Money worries have just exacerbated already existing doubts about the front-loaded nature of the primaries, officials and experts said.

"It started to snowball," said Leslie Reynolds, executive director of the National Association of Secretaries of State. "We're spending all this money, we don't have an impact on the process, and people aren't coming because they don't feel they have an impact."

"Clearly, the process is flawed," said Massachusetts Secretary of State William Galvin. "The country is only now beginning to wake up to the fact that there's a primary. Active Democrats are only now focusing on it. Average voters aren't focused at all. And that's not good."

Gans said the changes aren't all bad. A turn to caucuses strengthens person-to-person politics, rather than the TV-driven, mass advertising campaigns that mark big primary days like Super Tuesday, when 11 states vote at once.

Galvin, a Democrat, worries instead that the anti-primary push in GOP-controlled states is an effort to stop any criticism of Bush from within his party. "They don't want a president on the ballot when people can come out and make a protest," he said.

But Christine Iverson, a spokeswoman at the Republican National Committee, said the decisions have been made by the states, not the national party, and cost is the main concern.

"There's no reason to spend the money when it isn't necessary," she said.

In some states where the government has chosen not to hold the primary, the state Democratic Party has decided to conduct one anyway and bear the cost itself.

South Carolina's Democrats are struggling to raise an estimated $500,000 for their Feb. 3 contest.

Even if you can't be together this holiday, you can still be close.

Blown away

Wildcats dominate Iowa State 45-0, look toward Nebraska

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

AMES, Iowa – Darren Sproles broke more records, Ell Roberson was efficient and the Wildcat defense was destructive as K-State stormed past Iowa State 45-0 at Jack Trice Stadium.

It was K-State's fourth-straight win, keeping the Cats (8-3, 4-2) tied with Nebraska for the Big 12 North lead – and setting up a showdown Saturday in Lincoln, Neb., where the Cats haven't won since 1968.

Just minutes after the Cats wrapped up a dominating performance, talk turned to the Huskers.

"They're always a good football team," Coach Bill Snyder said, "and they're probably better when they're at home."

But looking ahead to Nebraska wasn't on K-State's mind a few hours earlier, when the Cats took the field with a wind chill dipping to 22 degrees.

All they did was turn up the heat.

Sproles, K-State's all-time leading rusher, ran for a career-best 201 yards on just 19 carries, including touchdown runs of 70, 32 and 23 yards.

He also broke the single-season all-purpose yardage mark, and his 1,300 yards this season move him within 156 yards of breaking his single-season mark set last year.

"You can hang around for a while, but sooner or later you break things open, especially when you have guys like Darren and Ell that can get you in the endzone from fairly far out."
Bill Snyder
COACH

"He really plays well," Snyder said. "I can't think of very many times I would have anything negative to say about Darren's performance."

That's not to say he had to carry the load, either. The Wildcat offense, which rolled up 503 yards, was evenly distributed.

Roberson completed 10-of-12 passes for 96 yards, and didn't throw an interception for the fourth-straight game.

In that time, he has accounted for 14 touchdowns – nine through the air and five on the ground.

Women's rowing takes trophy back

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's rowing team won the Sunflower Showdown over in-state rival Kansas on Saturday for the second year in a row.

Winning every event but one, and with numerous fans watching from the shores of Tuttle Creek Reservoir, the Wildcats finished their fall season on a high note.

"They did a workman-like job today, and I am very pleased with how they raced," Coach Patrick Sweeney said.

In the varsity A eight race, K-State finished with a time of 7:49.15, beating Kansas by almost 10 seconds. The varsity B eight race ended with a similar result, with the Wildcats coming across the finish line 19 seconds ahead of the Jayhawks.

"They raced according to plan, and it is nice to go into the spring season with a win," Sweeney said.

Sweeney was also pleased with the way the novice boats raced.

"We have a solid novice group, and that is encouraging for the future," he said.

Although novice coach James Rawson was worried at the beginning of the first novice race, he said his group showed him their athleticism.

"I'm really proud of the freshmen. They really pulled it together, took charge and had a fantastic last 500 meters," Rawson said.

Along with bragging rights and coxswains being thrown in the chilly water, the Sunflower Showdown trophy makes its way back to Manhattan once again.

"It eases my mind to have the trophy back here, but I will feel more comfortable if the cup stays here in the spring," Rawson said.

The traveling trophy went to Lawrence last spring after the Jayhawks won the Kansas Cup event 13-8.

"This was a good win for us because it makes the entire team feel good and it really unites the team all the way through," Sweeney said.

The K-State rowing teams will now head into winter training and prepare for the spring season, which starts in March.

"It will be a lot of hard work, but we will keep it fun," Rawson said. "They have to remember the long term goals and keep working towards those goals."

Women stomp Czech club

Wildcats set sights on nationally-ranked Purdue

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One thing Coach Deb Patterson doesn't have to teach her women's basketball team is to not look ahead.

No. 5 K-State guarded against that by blowing out Sparta Praha, a Czech club team, 103-47 Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum – setting up a showdown at fellow top-10 Purdue next Sunday.

"It will be tougher down the road," forward Kendra Wecker said. "We just have to stay focused and do our part."

They did that Sunday, opening the game with a 10-0 run before rolling to a 51-24 halftime lead, highlighted by a simple lay-in by Megan Mahoney.

Getting it to her wasn't so simple.

Chelsea Domenico played lock-down defense in causing a turnover – one of K-State's 19 steals – and shoveling the ball to guard Laurie Koehn.

Koehn threw it ahead to Wecker on the fast break, but the pass was just over her head and going out of bounds. Leaping into the padding under the basket, Wecker did the only thing she could.

"Because I'm special and I have eyes in the back of my head, I could see her there," Wecker joked about scooping the pass between her legs to the breaking Mahoney. "She just happened to be running the floor and be in the right spot."

K-State never let up in the second half, either, going on a 36-9 run to put the game well out of reach.

Mahoney finished with 20 points in just 20 minutes, shooting 8-of-9 from the field and hitting three three-pointers. Wecker added 18 points and eight rebounds, while Koehn had 14 points and hit four three-pointers.

The chemistry evident between veterans Mahoney and Wecker could well be extended to the freshmen, too.

Point guard Twiggy McIntyre had 11 points for the second time in her two-game career, while Claire Coggins hit on 5-of-9 shooting for 13 points in just 12 minutes.

The Cats' final tune-up for the Boilermakers gave the newcomers their final taste of major college basketball, and McIntyre said they are now ready to look ahead.

"The first game I had jitters," McIntyre said. "But those weren't present at all today. I just feel confident on the floor."

That confidence showed, Wecker said.

"From Wednesday to today, they made a big step," she said.

K-State out-scored Sparta 25-2 on the fast break, while the Wildcats also won the battle in the paint. They out-rebounded Sparta 50-33 and shot 50 percent for the game.

Kelly Glasscock | COLLEGIAN
K-State's Twiggy McIntyre shoots the ball after driving past Sparta Praha's Jana Novakova in Sunday's game at Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats won the game 103-47.

But that's all well against a Czech club team, Coggins said. Purdue is a different story.

"I haven't experienced a huge game yet, but Purdue's an incredible team," she said. "The girls have my back, and I have theirs, and we'll do what we have to do to beat them."

The game is the second of a double-header at the State Farm Tip-off Classic, typically the first marquee game of the women's basketball season.

Wecker said it's an honor for K-State to be chosen along with Purdue, Texas and Duke.

"It's incredible, the respect we've been getting," she said. "It says a lot about our team and all the hard work we've put in to get there.

"I'm excited. I wish we played there today."

FOOTBALL | K-State steps up for 1st 2003 shutout; team turns attention to Nebraska game

"You can bang around for a while," Snyder said, "but sooner or later you break things open, especially when you have guys like Darren and Ell that can get you in the endzone from fairly far out."

While the offense was busy scoring virtually at will, including 10 points by the second team after the starters were yanked late in the third quarter, the defense was teeing off on Iowa State's offense.

It posted its first shutout of the season and held Iowa State to 140 yards of offense – and only 40 of that coming in the second half.

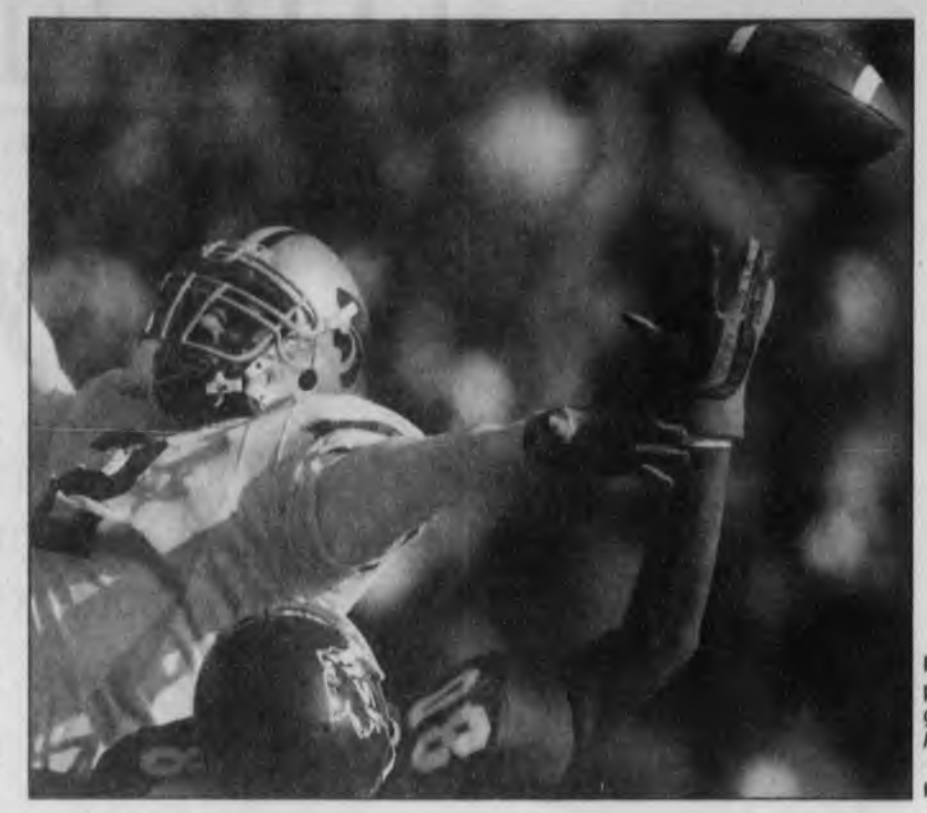
It was the first time K-State shutout Iowa State since 1970, and their streak of at least one shutout a season entered its 10th year.

Another benefit of the lopsided score was K-State's ability to put different players on the field.

Highly-touted junior college transfer Marvin Simmons made his debut on defense, racking up five tackles including two for a loss.

But K-State didn't talk much about the win over Iowa State, chalking it up to a business-like effort.

Instead, they began talking about Nebraska.



"We have to go up to play in Lincoln, a place that is historically tough for us to play," center Nick Leckey said.

Leckey, Andrew Shull and others remember the last trip to Lincoln, a 31-21 loss to the second-ranked Huskers in 2001.

They also remember what they were thinking as they left Memorial Stadium.

"A couple years ago, we talked about being up here our senior year playing," Shull said.

"Next week is the playoffs in the Big 12 North, and we're just going to fight for it."

Rashad Washington breaks up a pass to Lance Young in K-State's game Saturday afternoon in Ames, Iowa.

Judges give honor to Miss Afghanistan

Miss Afghanistan Vida Samadzai, condemned in her homeland for parading in a bikini at the Miss Earth contest, won the pageant's first "beauty for a cause" award on Sunday.

The 25-year-old Samadzai, the first Afghan in three decades to take part in a beauty contest, failed to make it to the contest's semifinals.

But judges announced that, for the first time, they were handing out a "beauty for a cause" prize. They awarded it to Samadzai for "symbolizing the newfound confidence, courage and spirit of today's women."

Samadzai could face prosecution if she returns to her native country because of her attire at the Manila pageant, a senior Afghan justice official said Saturday.

'Matrix Revolutions' top in box office

The sci-fi Matrix saga lost some of its spin at the U.S. box office, with "The Matrix Revolutions" pulling in $50.16 million in its opening weekend — off 45 percent from the previous chapter's weekend debut.

Distributor Warner Bros. preferred to focus on the worldwide results for "Revolutions." Warner opened the movie simultaneously in a record 109 countries, where it racked up a worldwide total of $204.1 million in five days, beating the previous global high of about $200 million for "The Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers."

Hot soup restores the mind and body for rigorous competition

ON THE MENU

A weekly column that critiques restaurants or discusses the details of cuisine.

This week, the football team travels to Nebraska, the men's basketball team has an exhibition, the women's basketball team opens the regular season at Purdue, and I have an abstract algebra exam.

Contests such as these often give those involved some nervousness. Preparation is the key, but you always worry whether you're prepared enough or in the right manner.

It can make you feel out of sorts. Nothing puts a person back on the straight and narrow better than hot soup.

SETH BISHOP

Anyone with an aged, white-haired grandmother knows of the restorative properties of chicken noodle soup.

Through extensive field research, I have found nearly all soups to have a quasi-restorative effect – except for French Onion, which has no redeeming qualities whatsoever.

It is true, however, that the effect will lessen as the soup has less in common with chicken noodle.

Chili, for example, gives its consumers a mildly pleasant feeling while being consumed. Within 20 minutes of consumption, however, the consumers no longer feel mildly pleasant.

Cassoulet, or any soup, can be a delicious, nutritious meal.

In truth, a full belly alone has its own healing powers, and if dinner is eaten with a gathering of friends and family, those healing powers are all the more effective.

The sports teams will practice their plays, run their drills and condition their minds and bodies for the upcoming contests.

I will read my notes, review the text and do my homework.

The rest of you will have to learn to overlook the soup stains on my shirt.

Seth is a graduate student in math. You can e-mail him at sbishop@ksu.edu.

Quick Cassoulet

1 can Campbell's Creamy Onion Soup
1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup
1 Cup water
1 can (16 oz) small white beans, rinsed and drained
1/2 pound kielbasa (a.k.a. Polish sausage), cut into 1/2 inch slices
4 small potatoes, peeled and quartered
3 medium carrots, cut into 1/2 inch pieces
1/2 tsp dried thyme leaves, crushed
1/8 tsp pepper
1 bay leaf

In 4-5 quart pot, combine all ingredients. Over medium heat, heat to boiling, stirring occasionally. Reduce heat to low.

Cover and cook for 25 minutes or until vegetables are tender, stirring occasionally. Remove bay leaf before ladling into bowls. Garnish with chopped parsley if desired.

Makes about 8 cups or 4-5 main dish servings.

Juggling Club fosters pastime

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shining red and gold clubs fly through the air of the Union Courtyard.

Kevin McBeth and Kenton Born, both freshmen in computer science, occasionally catch the attention of those watching them juggle.

McBeth and Born are members of the K-State Juggling Club. The two 19-year-olds have both been juggling for more than half their lives.

"I remember juggling while I was waiting for a baseball game when I was 9," Born said. "My coach told me to get my head in the game."

Club president Ryan Bradburn, junior in park management, has been juggling for four years, but still likes to refer to himself as a "newbie."

"These two guys are the best, and they're up on this tier," Bradburn said, holding his hand at chin level. He moved his hand down about a foot and said, "The rest of us are on this tier."

Bradburn was introduced to juggling by a friend while he was serving in the Marine Corps.

He said he enjoyed the game and wanted to get involved in juggling clubs to meet better jugglers than himself.

"That's why I was willing to put in the effort to get it started," he said of the K-State Juggling Club.

Bradburn transferred to K-State from Wichita State last semester, and with the help of former club president Krista Bright, resurrected the club, which had suffered from entropy since 1998. The first meeting of the new club was last March.

Born and McBeth joined the club this year. During club elections McBeth was elected vice president and Born, not wanting any responsibility, opted for a different position.

"We were voting for offices, and he said he'd be the slacker," Bradburn said of McBeth. "We were actually going to have a runoff, but that defeats the purpose of the position."

The weekend of fall break, Bradburn, McBeth and James Smith, a community member who attends club meetings, had a 15-minute performance during the Senior Fall Festival.

"It was a great first performance because they thought everything was funny," Bradburn said.

Kansas law prevents companies from shutting off residents' gas

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A world in which it is assured natural gas will stay serviced to homes across Kansas during the winter already is part of Kansas law.

It has been since 1983.

The cold weather rule went into effect Nov. 1 and will stay in effect until March 31. People must only make arrangements with their utility company before making the assumption they're eligible for the rule.

Marge Petty, director of public affairs and consumer protection for the Kansas Corporation Commission office in Topeka, said the rule was established in 1983 to make certain people have warm houses in winter months.

"People must make prior arrangements with their utility company," Petty said.

The utility company requires a one-twelfth payment on outstanding bills, a full payment on the disconnect and reconnect bills and a payment each month of one-twelfth the total bill, she said.

Petty said proper application of the rule can keep Kansans safe throughout the winter.

"It keeps people alert, and they can make arrangements to get connected and keep warm. This time of year, it is of the utmost importance to keep warm in your home," Petty said.

STRANGE BUT TRUE

WEIRD NEWS BY CHUCK SHEPHERD

Illustration by Stefanie Shank | COLLEGIAN

BODILY PLUMBING IN THE NEWS

In April, according to Uganda's prison service, 15 inmates escaped near Kampala after allegedly having weakened the jail's walls and cell bars by months of urinating on them. Also in April, The New York Times reported that a pest-control professional in Stockton, Calif., had developed a new termite-detection method that relies on locating concentrations of methane gas that are expelled because of termites' high-fiber (i.e., wood) diet. And in October, a tipsy undersecretary in the Philippine government apologized after inadvertently urinating in the rear of President Arroyo's plane during flight, in an area he mistook for a restroom.

ALTERNATE REALITY

In October, the U.S. Transportation Security Administration's inspector general released questions from the final exam for airport screeners, designed to measure the crucial, intensive training that the screeners had just completed. One question: "How do threats get on board an aircraft?" The supposedly challenging answers: "a. In carry-on bags; b. In checked-in bags; c. In another person's bag; d. All of the above."

If that is too difficult, the inspector general also complained that 22 of the exam's 25 questions were repeats from previous exams and that some test-takers were briefed in advance.

THINGS TO WORRY ABOUT

In September, customs officials in Amsterdam stopped a Nigerian man trying to enter the Netherlands with a suitcase containing 1,500 to 2,000 baboon noses (which some people use in traditional healing, but which were in an advanced state of putridness). And in Jupiter, Fla., in October, yet another part-time professional clown pleaded guilty to possessing child pornography; David Deyo, 43, a Presbyterian Sunday school teacher, appeared often in the community as "Noodles the Clown."

RECURRING THEMES

In Easton, Pa., in July, Robert M. Peters Sr., 47, became the latest man to be acquitted of indecent exposure by persuading a jury that his penis is too small to have been seen by the complaining witness. A woman testified that she had seen "3 inches" of erect penis beyond the bottom of his shorts while he was working in her home, but via photographs and a brief trouser-dropping in the courtroom, Peters convinced the jury that he is very modestly endowed and that she must have seen something else, such as a fold of fat on his 312-pound body.

Police finish investigation of missing boy

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley County police officers have completed their investigation in the disappearance of a 10-year-old Manhattan boy.

Kendal McBride was reported missing Nov. 4 after not returning home following his paper route.

Lt. Kurt Moldrup said at a press conference following McBride's recovery in Oklahoma City on Wednesday that McBride told police he had been chased by a dog while delivering papers and then crawled into an unoccupied Kenworthy semi-trailer truck for safety.

After eating some of the driver's lunch, McBride told police he crawled into the sleeping cab and fell asleep.

The driver, identified as Manhattan resident Kenneth Abernathy, began driving the truck; however, at what time is not known, Moldrup said.

Abernathy stopped at a truck stop in Oklahoma City, where he noticed his lunch was half-eaten and began searching his truck further, which led to his discovery of McBride asleep in the sleeping cab, Moldrup said.

McBride's father drove to Oklahoma City Wednesday to pick up his son. Riley County police officers interviewed the boy Thursday, and Abernathy was interviewed by the the Oklahoma City police department.

Moldrup said McBride's story was accurate as far as how he arrived in Oklahoma.

"What he said is accurate about getting in there," he said.

"We have not classified him as a runaway. He was just a missing child, and we recovered him."

Chris and Melissa McBride, Kendal's parents, issued a statement to media outlets Thursday afternoon.

"A huge weight has lifted from our shoulders and we are so thankful for the happy ending. We asked God to keep Kendal safe, and he did. Today, Kendal is home and our family is trying to pick up where we left off," the statement said.

"We are especially grateful to the truck driver who found Kendal in his truck and turned him over to police.

"We also want to express our sincere thanks to the Manhattan community for their tremendous support throughout the last 48 hours. All of the contributions of food, materials, time and energy have been overwhelming."

Moldrup said officers will interview Abernathy when he gets back in town after his business is complete, but there is no information missing from the case.

"There is no reason to be refreshed on that because he is not at all a suspect," he said.

"He is the one that notified the police."

With so much media attention, including TV crews from the Kansas City area and Topeka, the department has learned a lot about handling high-profile cases, Moldrup said.

"It turned out to be a good exercise," he said.

"We were very involved with the media and involved in the community in getting this information out. Had this been an abduction or had there been other circumstances, I think we would have been very successful at finding evidence and finding the child because we had so much other input."

City officials say Manhattan economy improving

By Amy Lundine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From July through September, the national economy grew at its fastest rate in almost two decades.

Manhattan's economy also is improving, although slowly.

The 7.2-percent rate of annual growth in the gross domestic product more than doubles the 3.3-percent rate in the previous quarter, and economists say the economy will continue to grow, but at a slower rate of 4 percent from October through December.

Bernie Hayen, chief financial officer for the city of Manhattan, said the local economy has experienced growth on a smaller scale, and he attributes much of this to the city's gain in sales tax dollars.

"Manhattan is becoming more and more of a regional draw for shoppers," Hayen said.

He said that although K-State students have always been the main consumers in the Manhattan area, shoppers also are being drawn from Emporia and Junction City.

Additionally, as troops rotate back into Fort Riley, spending in Manhattan continues to increase, Hayen said.

Economists said low short-term interest rates, combined with tax cuts, have given the public the confidence they need to buy and invest more.

They also said to maintain the healthy economy, job growth will be important.

"The tax relief we passed is working," President George Bush said. "We left more money in the hands of the American people, and the American people are moving this economy forward."

According to the Kansas Department of Human Resources and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the Kansas unemployment rate fell 2.17 percent from August to September 2003, while the Riley County employment rate remained stagnant in this period of time.

Hayen doubts the economic increase in the Manhattan area is due to the extra money in people's pockets from the tax cuts.

He said that if this were true, people would spend more initially, but then as their money ran out, return to regular buying patterns.

"I think it's more of a confidence in the economy," Hayen said.

He said the people are slowly building up their economic confidence, and with that they will continue to slowly spend more and more.

Bush said these economic growth numbers should not necessarily be expected every quarter, "yet by continuing a pro-growth agenda, we will sustain growth and job creation in this country."

"We're on the right track, Bush said, "but we've got work to do."

President, First Lady work the campaign money circuit

By Deb Riechmann
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. – President Bush vowed Monday to "stay focused on our economy," saying too many people remain out of work despite fresh signs of a vigorous business recovery.

"I'm encouraged by what I see," Bush said at the outset of a trip in which he and his wife, Laura, were splitting up re-election campaign duties. The pair was appearing at his-and-her fund-raisers in the South and Northeast.

Sandwiched around the four fund-raisers were two other public events – his appearance later Monday at a BMW auto plant in Greer, S.C., to discuss trade and the economy, and hers in Portland, Maine, which had preserving America's culture and history as its theme.

At a fund-raiser here, Bush talked about the latest economic statistics, including one showing the strongest quarterly growth in nearly 20 years and a dip in unemployment to 6 percent in October.

"I have laid out a six-point to the United States Congress to make sure that job creation remains strong and vibrant," he said.

"I will stay focused on our economy until the American people are able to put food on the table and take care of their family responsibilities by finding a job."

Bush acknowledged that "too many of our fellow Americans aren't working."

His visit to Arkansas, however, comes just days after reports of lagging state revenue collections and the highest state jobless rate in 10 years signal a sluggish state economic recovery.

In South Carolina, Bush was touting the virtues of free trade on a day when the World Trade Organization declared illegal steel tariffs that Bush imposed last year.

Critics said those tariffs on imported steel were an abandonment of Bush's free-trade principles.

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Students' input should be noted in evaluations

The Kansas Court of Appeals' decision to uphold K-State's removal of a tenured faculty member proves to strengthen limits on a potentially abusable program.

But we need more limits.

Students – who benefit or suffer the most from professors' teaching – should have more say in the removal of faculty members.

Currently, the system takes many things into account, primarily department head and peer evaluations.

Students are largely omitted from the process.

The researcher who brought the lawsuit against K-State admitted his own shortcomings and admitted not working to rectify them.

For this, he was rightfully removed.

K-State is doing the right thing in working with tenured faculty to correct their work.

Faculty who refuse assistance or do not improve should be removed.

University officials need to actively seek student input on tenured professors to ensure professors do not become complacent.

Students are both the primary consumers of the university and work closely on a daily basis with faculty, and their opinions should be taken into account whenever the possibility is viable.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Dear Grandpa,

Family member's death brings to light the consequences of smoking

Illustrations by Stefanie Shank | COLLEGIAN

Dear Grandpa,

I miss talking to you.

I have this constant feeling something is missing from my life.

NASRINA WILLIAMS

I guess that's because there is something missing.

It is ironic that the week after your death, my biology class begins a section on cancer. I am learning about the process your body has gone through these past several years, but I still don't understand your death.

I know lung cancer killed you. What I don't understand is why you smoked for so many years. One of my oldest memories is of tattling on you to Grandma when I caught you smoking in the back yard.

How could I, a young child, understand the danger of your actions when you didn't?

I also remember when Grandma was diagnosed with lung cancer. At this point, you both had quit smoking many years ago, but the damage already had been done.

We both watched Grandma struggle to survive. She went through surgery, radiation and chemotherapy; in the end, we still lost her. In some ways I know her death made us closer, because we both missed her.

Now, I have lost you both to the same sickness, I am so scared I will lose others. There are so many people I love who either smoke now or have in the past.

I never have understood the desire to smoke a cigarette. I guess having asthma as a child made me appreciate the ability to breathe.

You and Grandma didn't know the dangers of smoking when you started, but today people know smoking causes lung cancer, and they start smoking anyway. What could they possibly be thinking? I'm thinking cigarettes should be illegal.

It makes me so angry to think of the billions of dollars tobacco company executives pocket every year by killing people like you.

I have asked some of my friends at school why they smoke, but I have never gotten a satisfactory answer. Some say it helps with stress, others just chalk it up to addiction and some even have the ignorance to claim they wish to die before getting too old.

It is easy for young people to be cavalier about death. We all fall into the trap of feeling our youth makes us invulnerable. It is easy to want to die before getting too old when you don't realize the pain your children will have to experience when they watch you suffer.

It's not really about death, anyway.

I don't think they should give up smoking because it might help them live longer.

I prize quality of life over the length, and I know lung cancer does not bring a swift or peaceful death.

I know how hard it was for those of us who loved you to watch you slowly waste away, and I know how confusing it is to be relieved that a loved one has died because it hurt so much to watch them suffer.

While you were dying, there was a silly debate occurring on my campus about where smokers should have to go in order to smoke. I think smoking should be banned in every public place. Maybe then children wouldn't think it looked like such a cool and grown-up thing to do.

I don't condemn anyone for smoking. We all engage in risky behavior every time we eat unhealthy foods or drink too much beer, but risks have to be weighed in a thoughtful and realistic manner.

I hope more people will find the strength to quit smoking.

There are other ways to relieve stress. It is possible to fight an addiction.

By the time you and Grandma quit, it already was too late, but there are so many people who still have a chance.

Love always,
Your devoted granddaughter

Early morning workouts help improve alertness

I am not a morning person. I remember when I was in high school, my father would literally pick up one side of my mattress and roll me out of bed to get me to school on time.

JASON HEASER

Though I still begrudge the morning, I have learned a little morning exercise goes a long way in improving one's day.

I went to Army basic training in the summer of 1997. The drill sergeants there were less than polite about non-morning people, and I found myself having to do two things I hated in the wee hours of the morning – waking up and exercising.

However, I started to realize I had more energy the rest of the day after exercising.

As I was still in basic training, I just figured it was fear converted into energy through screaming and a lot of push-ups.

I went back to high school after basic and returned to my loathing of any hour before 8 a.m.

When I joined the active Army in 2000, I was reintroduced to the world of morning hours and morning physical training.

"The Army does more before 9 a.m. than the rest of the world does all day," was not a quote I longed to uphold, but I had a job to do.

While I was at Fort Riley, they had morning physical training four days out of five, starting at 6:30 a.m.

The difference of attitude and production between the physical days and the non-physical was phenomenal.

Now that I am part of the K-State Reserve Officer Training Corps, I am reminded that working out in the morning makes sense for K-State students, as well as for the men and women in green.

There has always been a large controversy about student parking at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

One way to avoid buying a parking pass just to work out is to do your routine in the morning.

Monday through Friday, the Rec Complex is open at six in the morning, and Edwards Hall doesn't let loose the all-too-eager ticket hounds until seven.

Morning exercise has taken a number of hits over the last few years.

According to www.cnn.com, some health experts claim working out in the late afternoon is healthier and more productive because of greater muscle readiness and enhanced circadian rhythms in the afternoon.

That basically means you are more awake and ready to exercise.

Despite this new trend toward afternoon workouts, I am still a fan of the morning workout.

One of the best analogies I ever heard for morning workouts: they're like a cup of coffee in the morning.

While it might take a little more effort than turning on a pot, I'm sure even the naysayers can agree doing your workout in the morning is a whole lot healthier than a cup of Joe.

Personally, I still enjoy my coffee and hate the morning, but getting in a quick workout makes the rest of the day a lot more bearable.

TO THE EDITOR

Dangerous intersection requires city maintenance

Editor,

We are writing about an ongoing concern relating to pedestrian safety along North Manhattan Avenue and Old Claflin Road. Despite a 1999-2000 improvement project, members of the K-State community still insist much more needs to be done.

In March 2002, K-State student Da Jung Yu was struck by a vehicle traveling north on North Manhattan Avenue. Due to the severity of her injuries, Yu was transported back home and K-State lost a community member.

According to a City of Manhattan report in 2000, approximately 14,000 to 15,000 motorists travel along North Manhattan Avenue daily, along with 290 pedestrians who cross this busy intersection at Old Claflin Road.

Despite this high volume of motorist and pedestrian traffic, as well as the loss of a student and friend, the City of Manhattan has yet to continue improvements on this intersection.

Time and time again, the K-State community petitions for more improvements to this particular intersection, with good intention. This intersection serves as a link between the Derby residence hall complex, many off-campus housing communities and Aggieville.

Historic petitions include, but are not limited to, funding for pedestrian-activated flashing beacons and reevaluation of the classification of the roadway. We, however, are asking for something a bit simpler.

The other night, while we were out surveying the intersection, we noticed it was poorly maintained. Three overhead lights that illuminate the vicinity were burned out. More specifically, one located on the northeast corner of the intersection was black, and has been for some time.

This darkness and lack of maintenance are major safety flaws on the North Manhattan Avenue and Old Claflin intersection.

As members of the K-State community, we must hold the City of Manhattan accountable for proper maintenance of this intersection. The luminaries surrounding the North Manhattan Avenue and Old Claflin intersection should be put on a regular maintenance schedule, effective immediately.

Now is the time for K-State to take this stand. As Wildcats, we need to mandate that out community ensures our safety. Let's hold the responsible parties accountable for correcting these fatally-flawed maintenance issues concerning the North Manhattan and Old Claflin intersection.

Student criticizes spending habits, links SUV owners with overeating

Editor,

I don't want to throw what intellectual girth I may have into a dogmatic argument over abortion or gay marriage, arguments whose combatants are, at this point, interested only in shouting themselves hoarse to be heard over the din of contention.

No, I want instead to consider an idea that occurred to me Sunday afternoon as I drove home from St. Louis.

My big brother and I pulled off the interstate to purchase a tasty, caffeinated beverage. As we drove the car into a Taco Bell parking lot, my eyes were drawn to the cars lining the lot.

They were all SUVs.

Mammoth, gargantuan and excruciatingly humongous, these steel monsters dominated the Missouri landscape like Chartres Cathedral.

While my brother went inside to use the restroom, I sat in the car, wedged between a Yukon with a side mirror bigger than my torso and a Chrysler that will explode when shot with an automatic weapon, if "The Matrix Reloaded" is to be believed.

As I waited for my brother, who evidently was having some difficulty in the restroom, the owners of several SUVs came out of the restaurant and climbed into their $50,000 monstrosities. Next door at McDonald's, there were a similar number of SUV owners returning to their cars.

That is the moment I had the second most startling epiphany of my life – nine out of 10 of those SUV owners were, shall we say, not physically fit. One man was carrying what appeared to be a "backup" hamburger for the road, while another young woman was still finishing her burrito.

At first I scoffed at these folks, since they managed in one trip to burn off at least 10 gallons of gasoline and consume enough saturated fats to kill a small puppy, but then I said to myself:

"Think pragmatically, Jon. These people are simply being strategic with their resources. Like Craig Harms and Rob Pettay taught you in kinesiology class, fats are a vast source of energy, much more than carbohydrates.

"Clearly, these people have access to the same knowledge and are preparing themselves for a precarious future in which fossil fuels are only for the most wealthy and the global food market has just produced something called 'Soylent Green' in order to meet the demands of a demanding populace.

"What's more, they are trying to speed along the process by using as much gasoline as possible. Everyone should strive to be like them."

That is why today I plan to drive, rather than walk, the quarter-mile from my apartment to the coffee shop.

That is why I will go to the gas station today and spray into the street liquid evidently worth the lives of 350 U.S. soldiers and counting.

That is why, in the interests of storing as much saturated fat as possible, I will try to move around as little as possible, let alone not exercise.

That is why I will pass by the fruits and vegetables aisle at the grocery store and head directly for the "excessive serving size" area.

If we all unite behind the banner of consumption, waste and poor stewardship, a bright future most certainly awaits us.

Political satire reflects society's view of voting, lack of choice in candidates

Editor,

I have to wonder what the Democratic presidential nominees – nay, all the politicians in this country – are thinking right now as we move toward what will be dubbed the 2004 election fiasco.

To see what politics is all about in America, all one has to do is turn on Comedy Central.

The best thing about Comedy Central is that it speaks exactly what the people are thinking. The worst thing about Comedy Central is that by watching it, you will know exactly what the people in America are thinking. It's not a pretty picture.

Do any politicians in this country understand that half the body politic is laughing at them? Do they know that what is said on "The Daily Show," though designed to be humorous, smacks more of the truth than anything that will be uttered from a politico's mouth this election season?

It's more than ironic, really. Here are a bunch of old white men who are so far removed from what the people are thinking that they have no idea the jokes we are telling about them aren't mere constructions. Why did "The Daily Show" win an Emmy? Because it reports the news!

Politics in this country have become such a joke that people refuse to turn out to vote. It's not that we are lazy or uninformed. Rather, the general consensus among those who are of voting age is, to quote a friend of mine, "All the candidates are the same. Why should I sell out to the lowest bidder?"

During the 2000 election theft, I heard the two presidential candidates say the exact same thing over and over again. The only difference I can point to is that Bush was in favor of destroying millions of acres of pristine Alaskan wilderness in search of oil, while Gore thought maybe that was a bad idea.

There are still a few people out there who believe in the system. They tend to say we have no right to bitch about the current political situation if we didn't get out and vote.

Vote for what? Choosing between the Democrats and the Republicans is like choosing between the noose and the firing squad. The only difference is we get to choose which face we are going to see for the next four years.

I have personally given up hope. I am sure there are those who will tell me if I am unsatisfied, then I should move to another country and get away from that which I find distasteful. People who say things like that fail to remember what democracy is all about, so let me clue them in.

The best part about America is that I don't have to move. This country was founded on the idea that maybe everyone's vote would count. Reading between the lines, the issue now is no one's vote counts. Voting for the Democrats or the Republicans gets you the same person.

That means that my vote literally doesn't matter, and if our votes don't count, then we are not living in a democracy – we are living in a fascist state.

One crazy drummer

Student keeps the beat for 2 local bands

By Rachel Krier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN

Dustin Keith works through a song at Bobby T's Bar and Deli on Thursday. Keith preforms double duty, playing drums for both Ten Til Blue and Gang of Hours.

Dustin Keith doesn't just keep the beat when he plays the drums. He also keeps the audience and his fellow band members guessing what crazy stunt he'll try next.

Once, during a show at Dave's Hideaway, Keith stood up from behind his trap set and proceeded to rip the disco ball from the ceiling and jam it over his head. He kept playing with the broken sphere of mirrors on his head, and a little blood trickling down the side of his face.

"I like to get a rise out of people. I consider myself an entertainer and a musician," Keith, senior in marketing, said. "I'm not going to be the guy who just sits back there and keeps the beat."

Keith plays the drums in two local bands, Gang of Hours and Ten Til Blue. No matter which band he is playing with, he is known as being one crazy drummer, said Brian Cromwell, lead guitarist in Gang.

"Dustin is out of control, '80s style," Cromwell, senior in biology, said. "If he's not doing something, then I'm shocked."

Cromwell said Gang's motto is, "Rock the place like you own it," and Keith fulfills that motto.

It was during a Gang performance that Keith set his cymbals on fire using rubber cement. The stunt was prior to the Rhode Island night-club fire, which caused concerns about incorporating fire into indoor musical performances.

He also is known for playing blindfolded, with a beer in one hand or with cue sticks instead of drum sticks, Cromwell said. Keith will kick any piece of equipment that isn't working correctly, Cromwell said.

Such antics are part of Keith's stage presence, which isn't always so similar to his off-stage personality, Cromwell said.

"Dustin is pretty easygoing. He's a pretty cool cat, and then you get him behind a drum kit and he's a rock star," Cromwell said. "If he's feeling it, he gets in his own world."

Keith plays with his whole body – both his legs are stomping to the beat with the use of his double bass pedal, his arms are moving everywhere like he has six of them and his sweat-drenched head is banging right along.

Keith isn't just a crazy drummer, he also is a talented one, David Owens, TTB bassist, said.

"Dustin has a good view of how music should be, and he's able to communicate his ideas to us," Owens, senior in hotel and restaurant management, said. "Our tastes in music aren't the same at all. He's able to adapt to whatever type of music we're playing."

Gang and TTB are quite different, Keith said, but he brings the same energy to the stage for both.

Keith said TTB started as a cover band but now plays several original tunes that range from almost country to rock. Keith has been playing with TTB for about a year and a half, he said. They have just recorded their first demo album with three original songs.

Playing cover songs was a good way to get their name out and showcase their talents, but TTB is ready to move on, Owens said.

"It's really neat to see people getting into music we've written," Owens said. "It's not the same when you're playing someone else's music."

Gang is more straight hard-rock, Cromwell said. Keith said he has been with Gang for about three years but has played with certain members of the band even longer. Gang has a six-song album.

Keith said he hasn't had any scheduling conflicts with the two bands. Members from both bands are friends and roommates, and they work with each others' schedules. Actually, the two bands will play the same gig for the first time this week, which means Keith will play back-to-back sets. Keith said he is confident he won't get tired.

"I love playing the drums – I could play all night," Keith said.

Gang tends to draw a bigger crowd in Lawrence, and TTB does better in Manhattan, Keith said, although he hasn't figured out why.

"I'm a marketing major, and I should now about consumer behavior, but I don't," Keith said. "I wish I could figure out what music people like – but that's kind of stupid because I'm playing for me, too, because I enjoy it, and I just hope other people do.

"I like the satisfaction of being able to create something with my friends. The other guys would say that it's the crowd, but if the crowd likes it, then that's a plus."

Keith said his favorite music to play and listen to is rock 'n' roll, but he'll "give anything an ear."

"A good rock n' roll tune can portray so much emotion if it's done well – a good hooky, rock n' roll tune that grabs your ear," Keith said. "You could say I am in search of the song that everyone else gets that same feeling out of, that they can't stop listening to it."

Keith said he thinks both bands have songs that fit that description, but he foresees more to come.

"We are by no means at our best," Keith said. "The goldies are still yet to come."

Acoustic artist accompanies improvisational musicians

By Wendy Gorman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For Dan Bergen, it's all about making a connection.

"Sitting up here with a guitar in my hand, that gives me the freedom to tell my story. With a mic in front of me, everybody listens, or they don't, but they're out there. I think that connection is what the music's about."

Bergen, graduate student in English, plays the acoustic guitar at several area venues. He said certain types of environments are suited for music.

"One of my favorite places to play would probably be here at Radina's because the coffee shop environment is a really comfortable place to play acoustic sort of singer/songwriter music," he said.

Bergen said he has been playing the acoustic guitar for five years. He plays mostly folk rock and has written about 25 originals.

"Kind of what you listen to on the radio today, you know: John Mayer, Jack Johnson, Dave Matthews," he said.

Kristin Doyle, senior in life sciences, has heard Bergen play and said his original songs have gotten stuck in her head before.

"His original songs are really good," Doyle said. "His music really means a lot to him. He has a lot of passion in it."

Bergen said that though many musicians who write for the acoustic guitar use their music to examine social issues, at this point he draws most of his inspiration from his own experiences.

"I'd like to move in that direction more," he said. "Right now I don't feel worldly enough to, I guess. I don't feel like I've had enough experience. Most of my inspiration comes from my life and from friends."

Brandon Noone, who plays drums for The Dank Nuggets, said Bergen has opened and played between sets for the band.

"When we take set breaks, we like to have something playing so you don't lose the crowd," said Noone.

Noone said although The Dank Nuggets has a different style from Bergen – a mixture of '70s funk, blues and improvisational jams – including the acoustic music between sets is successful.

"People like acoustic guitar players because if you have two or three bands playing, sometimes people's ears get tired, and they don't listen as much," Noone said.

Bergen said he has had some interesting interactions with the crowds at shows. Once, he said, while playing between sets for another act, he noticed a man in the front making a strange gesture.

"He was pointing, like a gun, at two finger, like the peace sign," Bergen said.

"When I was done I walked off the stage and I said, 'What was that all about?' And he was like, 'Death to all hippies, man. Death to all hippies.' That was a pretty intense moment."

Bergen said it can be difficult to gauge how packed a show will be. It often depends on what other things are going on.

"Yeah, I've played shows where it's just me and the sound guy," Bergen said.

"But those are the moments when you realize you're doing this one thing for yourself. The music is about how I feel, and it's an expression of what's going on in my life and inside of me."

U.N.I.T utilizes several genres, music theory to create tunes

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Blending nearly as many musical styles as there are band members, The U.N.I.T. has created a multi-layered sound combining jazz, hip hop, funk and rock.

"Somebody at one of our shows said – and I think they meant it in a harsh connotation, but I took it as a complement – we need to pick a genre," said Aaron Graversen, tenor saxophone player, flute player and vocalist. "We listen to so much. We've broadened our style and can play just about anything and remotely pull it off – with the exception of blue grass and country, since we're not very good at those."

Formed in Manhattan in 2002, the U.N.I.T is a band comprised of six music students, all of whom have backgrounds in jazz.

Aside from Graversen, senior in music education, the band includes: guitar player Brandon Cummins, sophomore in music composition; Ryan Kazmaier, who plays every other kind of saxophone, senior in music performance; keyboard player Matt Williams, sophomore in open-option; bass player Kelly McCarty, sophomore in music performance; and drummer Matt Leifer, freshman in music performance.

"A lot of bands out there, they really love the music, but they go on a day-to-day basis. We deal with music constantly," Graversen said.

"We go to classes for music, playing our instruments in all different ensembles.

"Whether that has an effect or not, we're constantly playing our instruments and perfecting our craft."

Dealing with music every day means dealing with music theory, which Cummins said takes everything that sounds good in music and makes it intellectual.

"It's basically a bunch of crusty white people who don't have anything better to do than go back and figure out what the masters did," Graversen said. "It's really cool to have that to an extent, but if you get too involved in that, you lose sight of what music is about."

Lead singer of the U.N.I.T. Aaron Graversen, senior in music education, plays the flute during an outside performance.
Chris Hanewinckel
COLLEGIAN

Going along with their name, Graversen said the band works as a unit, meaning without one guy, the band just wouldn't sound the same.

"If you take away one of the saxophones – we harmonize a lot of stuff – you'll miss a whole layer," Kazmaier said.

In addition to the sax, Graversen also busts out the flute for a solo on occasion.

"I've been working on getting better on the flute," Graversen said. "There's quite a few jazz flute players out there I've heard, and I think it's incredibly cool.

"The flute is one of those instruments that people just have a certain image in their brains about it, and when you present it in a cool fashion, they take a step back because they don't expect to see some pasty skinny kid pull out a flute and play a solo on that."

It was old-school hip hop responsible for leading Graversen to jazz because he said a lot of hip-hop had the tendency for DJs to sample old jazz, urban beat to that, and they'd rap over that.

Like the music, the lyrical content of The U.N.I.T's raps also has roots in the battles of old school hip-hop, about defending yourself and saying what you're all about, Graversen said.

"The main thing I've been into now is, I feel like the whole world has got itself into a routine and is just going through the motions," Graversen said.

One of the things he said he's been trying to do is just inspire people to think about where they're going.

"I have this very distinct dream that I'm fighting like hell to achieve, and I look at other people, and I just don't see it," he said. "I see the glazed look in their eyes, and they're just interested in getting drunk and breaking bottles over their head.

"I just want to raise the bar musically, so it's more about writing great music and less about image because we're not attractive," Graversen said.

Manhattan bands tour region, release albums in attempt to expand audience base

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's no secret Manhattan does not have a reputation for being a big music scene, but that has not stopped these three local bands from getting out and playing their music.

"We have a lot of energy... when people come and watch us, they should expect to get their socks rocked off."

Brandon Eck
VOCALIST AND GUITARIST FOR THREE RIVERS KENNEDY

THREE RIVERS KENNEDY

This three-person band formed in 2001 in Manhattan. Ben Gray, bassist, said they define their music as first and foremost, rock.

"It's definitely rock with a sort of hard edge to it," Gray, senior in electrical engineering, said. "We like to listen to a lot of other indie music, so it's hard to describe our style other than saying it's rock."

Gray said their musical influences span from local bands to mainstream bands.

"A few of our favorite local bands are Chicago 7 and Addictive Behavior," Gray said. "Then, some of my favorite regional bands would be Ultimate Fakebook, the Get Up Kids and some other bands from Lawrence.

"There are so many different influences like the Foo Fighters and Nirvana."

Vocalist and guitarist Brandon Eck said people can expect having a good time at a Three Rivers Kennedy show.

"We have a lot of energy, and we like to have fun all around," Eck, senior in graphic design, said. "We joke around and have a good time. But when people come and watch us, they should expect to get their socks rocked off."

Eck said they just recorded a CD and will have a release party in about three weeks.

Three Rivers Kennedy takes advantage of the summer break for touring. Last summer, they toured to Florida and back, Eck said.

Drummer Justin Peterson, senior in graphic design, said they've been able to team up with the Chicago 7, the Pembertons and Mankato. He said touring is fun, but a band can never forget its roots.

"In Florida, we didn't know anyone and a guy came up and told us we played great, and that made us feel good. You feel like you've accomplished something when you play somewhere else, but you can't take your hometown for granted."

The future for Three Rivers Kennedy is very open and promising, Peterson said.

"Once we all graduate this year, we're going to move to Kansas City," Peterson said. "We're going to make the band more of a priority. In school, it's hard to take off for two weeks and tour."

THE CHICAGO 7

They don't have seven band members – they have five, and none of them are from Chicago. Nonetheless, the band The Chicago 7 is becoming known for its music, and not so much for the origin of the name.

"Actually, our drummer brought (the band name) to the table. Apparently in the '60s, when they had the Chicago riots, seven guys from Indiana crossed state lines and incited the riot," Nolan Fabricius, guitarist, said. "He's into the political part of it; we're into the humor side of it."

Fabricius, sophomore in graphic design, said the Chicago 7 doesn't like to keep their music simple.

"It's very layered," Fabricius said. "We like to switch the tempo up. We're heavier but with lots of layers. We have three guitarists, so we all get to do different things."

Patrick Crough, guitarist, said they're where they want to be musically and are now trying to concentrate on their shows.

"We definitely have rocking shows," Crough said. "They're loud and our songs have different feels to them. We try to bring it up, then back down. We just want to try to put on the best show we can."

For vocalist and guitarist Travis "Trapper" Edwards, the music is more personal. He said he finds it liberating.

"It's sort of a release," Edwards said. "In this band, I write more than what I did in other bands. There's a lot of freedom in that. The stuff I write is more personal.

"We're not out to put people down, and it's not about ourselves. It's all about the music."

Edwards said the only problem they have is scheduling.

"We have five people in our band," Edwards said. "So we can have some communication problems. But it always works out because we all know what we're after."

Things are always looking up, Fabricius said. He said they had the opportunity to open up with one of the band's influences: the Year of the Rabbit.

"It definitely was something I would have never expected," Fabricius said. "It's sort of weird. The Year of the Rabbit is opening for A Perfect Circle now. So we opened for the band that's opening for A Perfect Circle."

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN
Chicago 7 guitarist Patrick Crough and lead singer Trapper play though their set at the Opus Band Competition.

"They're really friendly, and it's good to know the people you look up to are still human."

CLAP

The band Clap has played all over this summer, Michael Haag, vocalist and guitarist, said.

"We played in St. Louis some," Haag, K-State graduate, said. "We went to Wichita, Kansas City and in the area.

"But this next summer we're hoping to go with the Chicago 7 for two weeks. I think we're going to Oklahoma, Texas, up through Arkansas and Missouri."

Haag said money isn't a huge motivation for the band, as long as they make enough for gas. He said the important thing is finding a place you like to play.

"We like places like Gumby's and Auntie Mae's," Haag said. "They are a couple of places we like to play at. We like them because the crowds are there to see music, and that's more fun. It's not just a bunch of people getting smashed."

Haag said Clap is more of his type of music. He said one thing he likes is they don't do covers.

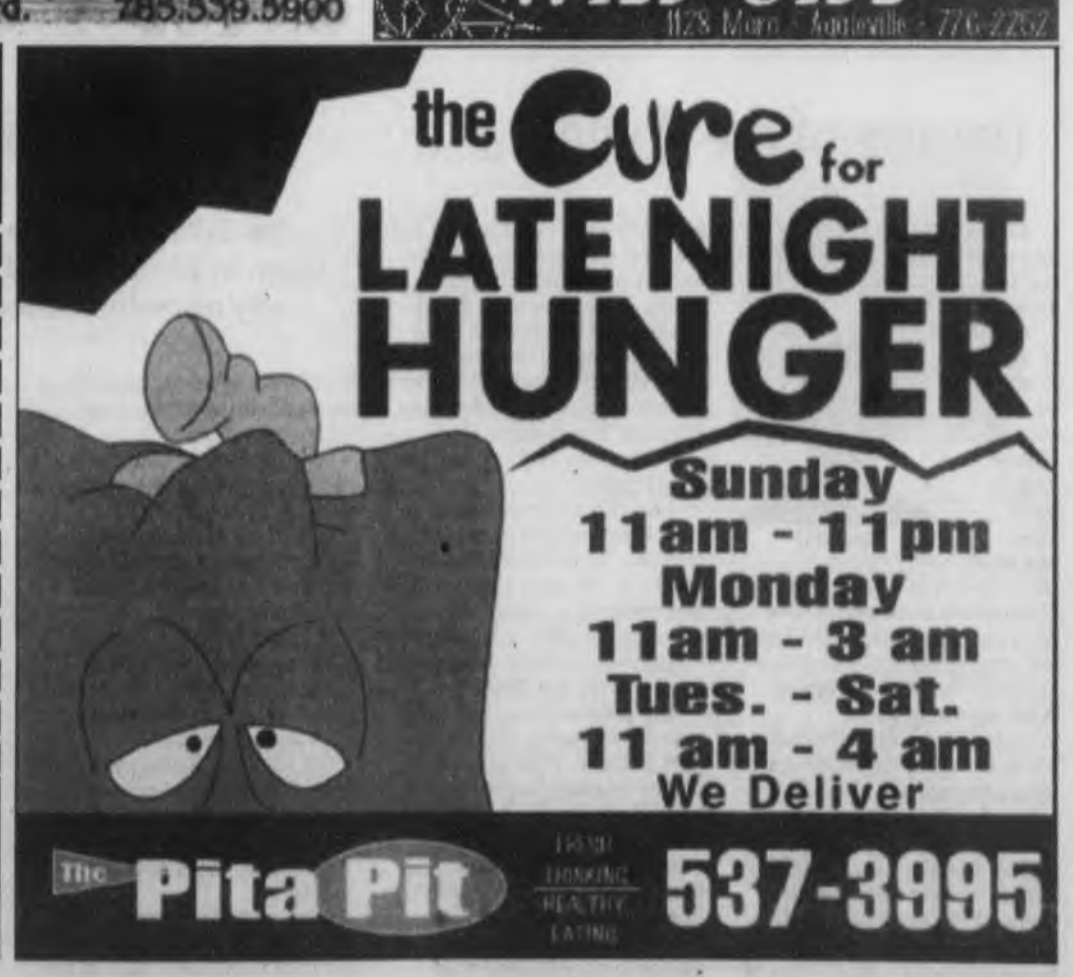
"I think Jordan (Brown) and I have our own distinct blend," Haag said. "The way he sings is different than how I sing.

"We like to play harder stuff and sometimes more poppy stuff. We like to offer more variety."

Vocalist and drummer, Andy Lewis, said one thing he really likes, is how Clap likes to base their music on originality.

"Not all of our songs sound the same," Lewis said. "We try to be as high energy as possible. We like to learn a little more each time we play and go on tour."

Lewis said the band is really close. He said having a close friendship helps them get by.



"We always bitch a little at each other," Lewis said. "It's generally sort of little stuff. We're all pretty serious about making music our career, and that helps us stick together. Though that's probably everyone's dream – everyone that is in a band.

K-State divided on soap opera involving Kobe Bryant

Students interested in Lakers star's scandal for different reasons

By Louie Novak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kobe Bryant was one of many tagged as the next Michael Jordan.

The basketball phenom who joined the NBA directly out of high school had all the ability, looks and charisma that "His Airness" had.

Bryant was intelligent, had a squeaky clean image and was a role model to millions of fans across America.

This past summer, the Los Angeles Lakers star continued to follow in the great Michael Jordan's footsteps by having an extra-marital affair. The difference is unlike Jordan, Bryant is being charged with sexual assault.

"It's sad to say, but we love it when famous people get in trouble"

Kali Sallman
SENIOR IN PUBLIC RELATIONS

Bryant is accused of raping a 19-year-old woman June 30 at an exclusive mountain resort near Edwards, Colo., where she worked. Bryant has said the two had consensual sex, but if convicted, Bryant could face four years to life in prison and 20 years to life on probation.

The case picks back up this week, and the feeding frenzy surrounding the saga will continue. Stories on Bryant will spread out in all local and national media outlets. The question is, do we still care?

Stevy Townsel, freshman in arts, believes the whole thing is out of control.

"It is just outrageous," Townsel said. "I just don't understand why a guy who is worth millions would go and do what the girl is accusing him of. I mean, come on – he could get any girl he wants."

Townsel added that he thinks

Showing Hart

Senior guard trying to make amends for 2nd DUI offense

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's difficult not to believe Jarrett Hart when he talks.

The senior guard on the men's basketball team looks straight into your eye. He nods agreeably when he's listening, and he shakes his head with closed eyes when he's getting ready to answer a difficult question.

Then he follows with a slow, sincere answer.

But recently, they've all been difficult questions for Hart.

On Sept. 8, Hart was arrested for driving under the influence, his second offense.

"He's really disappointed that it happened again," Coach Jim Wooldridge said. "He understands that when you do things like that, there's a price to pay. There's a price to pay from a legal matter and there's a price to pay within the program."

Settling a second DUI charge in court can be costly. Fines and fees add up quickly, and a lengthy period without a driver's license can add tension when buddies always ask for a ride, or strain the pocketbook always hailing a cab.

Settling a second DUI in the program is different, however. Doing so won't cost Hart a cent, but it is an embarrassing, humbling experience, he said.

"I had to prove myself all the way around," Hart said. "It was kind of embarrassing to have to go to school and everyone seeing me, being in the paper, and things of that nature."

Hart was nearly kicked off the team. When players encounter such trouble, Wooldridge said he takes them on a case-by-case basis, but has to keep the punishment within the established rules of the program.

Getting two DUIs in less than a year might have pushed those boundaries. Still, Wooldridge said he saw something in those eyes which Hart winces closed when barraged by reporters' questions.

"The level of confidence I have in him says we can straighten this out, get on a straight path and stay there," Wooldridge said. "Some people you have confidence in – some people you don't."

"I treat it like baseball, three strikes, you're out. I'm really lucky coach just kept me on the team."

Jarrett Hart
SENIOR GUARD

Wooldridge has confidence in Hart.

After his first DUI, Hart was forced to sit out one game last season. He also sat out of K-State's first exhibition game last week.

Hart's punishment is not over. Wooldridge, in classifying him as "day-to-day," said his position on the team is being evaluated to make sure he is committed to following the right path.

Will Hart play in Saturday's final exhibition?

No one knows, not even Wooldridge.

"We've given him the ability to come back into our program, make amends and move forward," Wooldridge said.

The one person who might have a clue, however, is Hart, himself.

Wooldridge said that despite his confidence in the senior guard, he has to prove his commitment every day, from the moment he walks into his first class to the second his head hits the pillow.

"We think he understands where he is," Wooldridge said. "We think he wants to be a better citizen. We think he wants to be a better teammate and a better person. We've given him that chance to do that. I think he can."

As far as the basketball team is concerned, Hart can't make it back too soon. His experience, both on and off the court, is important to a critically young team.

Jarrett Hart grabs a rebound during the second half of K-State's victory over Lipscomb in 2002.

Hart averaged 7.5 points per game and started 14 times last season. He would play prominently in a lineup featuring two newcomers as starters and six who received significant playing time in a 79-67 loss to the EA Sports All-Stars.

As for how the situation has affected Hart, there is little doubt it's been dramatic. He said he always took his life for granted, and despite being jerked to reality after his first DUI, it didn't sink in until he was being arrested for his second.

Standing with a face full of tape recorders and eyes blanked by television camera lights, Hart listened to the questions, closed his eyes and shook his head.

"Are you a better person for it?" a reporter asked.

"I think so," Hart said. "I treat it like baseball, three strikes, you're out. I'm really lucky coach just kept me on the team. I've proven myself since school started. He saw that. He saw how I faced it like a man."

Demise of the Raiders a source of anguish, frustration for their avid fans

It's early Sunday evening and yours truly is contemplating what issue to tackle for his Tuesday column.

Josh Witt

Will it be an analysis on the start of college basketball? How about all those upsets in college football? Or maybe a fresh perspective on King James, 'Melo, the Lakers soap opera and why this could be the most intriguing NBA season in years.

The options were limitless. Then my team, the Raiders, lost. To an extremely bad football team. Again.

Now, for my own psychological well-being, I am forced to vent about the team that is doing all it can to ruin my life.

Things were looking so well in the off-season. All the key ingredients were coming back for the AFC Champions. Cornerbacks Charles Woodson and Phillip Buchanon were finally healthy, the offense was older but also sporting the league's MVP in Rich Gannon and two Hall-of-Fame receivers in Jerry Rice and Tim Brown.

Haha, Josh Witt! You've just been Punk'd!

I don't even know where to start in attempting to explain why the 2-7 Raiders are possibly the worst team in football and could very realistically not win another game this year.

Injuries continue to mount for the silver and black.

Big-play wide receiver Jerry Porter was out for the first half of the season. Almost every offensive lineman has been banged up. Linebacker Bill Romanowski could be forced to retire due to concussions. The current quarterback situation has gone from horrible after losing Gannon for several games to catastrophic with backup Marques Tuiasosopo being sidelined for the year with a knee injury.

...the 2-7 Raiders are possibly the worst team in football, and could very realistically not win another game this year.

For the love of God, Rick Mirer was the starting quarterback on Sunday.

Oh, but I didn't have to worry because perennial superstar Rob Johnson was signed to back him up.

Fantastic.

Then there's the critical penalties, turnovers, dropped passes and poor tackling. It goes on and on.

At least the Raiders have stayed positive and continue to support each other through adversity.

Oh wait, that's not happening, either.

Before Romanowski was sidelined, he was busy breaking his own teammate's face in the preseason. Woodson and Coach Bill Callahan have undergone a constant war of words. Several Raiders players were subpoenaed in a steroid investigation.

Seriously, if the writers for "Playmakers" are coming up short for more over-the-top ideas for their second season, I suggest taking the cameras and following around the Raiders.

On this week's groundbreaking episode of "Playmakers," the team's linebacker is caught stealing the center's prescription pills, the owner finds himself in the midst of a multi-million dollar lawsuit, the kicker lands in jail after a drunken rampage and much, much more.

Good times.

Now I sit here, after just witnessing an overtime loss to the New York Jets, in a state of disbelief. My team now has lost to the Browns, Bears, Lions and Jets in the same season.

I'm speechless.

This past Saturday night provided the best example of how far the Raiders have fallen. I was back home talking football with a fellow Raiders fan when we found ourselves discussing all that was wrong with our team.

Then we found a positive, and something close to this exchange took place.

"Hey dude, but how badass is our punter Lechler."

"Yeah man, he's nuts. And Janikowski, that guy can kick."

"Yeah, our kicking game is awesome."

The kickers are the highlight of the season.

Sad. Very, very sad.

In search of an idol

Grant Buell, sophomore in architectural engineering, plays an original and yet untitled piece during rehearsals for K-State Idol. Buell's initial performance was too muffled, according to the coordinators, so he raised the lid to get better sound. One student went so far as to perform magic tricks, and another sang American Idol Kelly Clarkson's song, "A Moment Like This."

Students to showcase variety of talents in UPC contest tonight

By Lauren Morano
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An old tradition is getting a new chance.

For the first time in more than 20 years, K-State is having a university talent show. K-State Idol, which is being put on by the Union Program Council, is at 7:30 tonight in Union Forum Hall.

Although this sounds a lot like "American Idol," K-State Idol is different, said Ashley Holmes, special events committee chair for UPC.

"We have 11 acts for the show," Holmes said.

"There are vocal, musical and magic acts."

The 11 acts will be divided into three categories: variety, vocal and vocal with accompaniment.

In the vocal with accompaniment category, there are three guitarists and one pianist, Lauren Cox, special events assistant chair, said.

"In the variety category, there is a magician and a piano player who will play original work," Cox said.

Two winners will be picked from each category and out of those winners, the overall winner is chosen, Holmes said.

First place will receive a cash prize and gift certificates to local businesses will be given to other place finishers. Three judges – a UPC member, a professor from the Department of Music and a Classy Cat – will pick the winners, Cox said.

Grant Buell, sophomore in architectural engineering, is performing two piano songs he wrote himself.

"I've been playing piano for 11 years, have been writing music for about four or so and have written these two pieces within the last few months," Buell said.

Melissa Mathy, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, is performing a song from a past American Idol, Kelly Clarkson's "A Moment Like This."

Daniel Munden, senior in agronomy, is singing and playing his guitar to a song called "Audience of One" by Big Daddy Weave. Although he admits to getting nervous, it is just part of the act.

"I get a little nervous before I go up, but once I get into the song I just concentrate on the words and chords and have fun," Munden said.

"I love to sing, especially if I can sing a song to the Lord. It allows me to share my heart and what I claim is important in my life."

Admission to the talent show is free, but audience members who bring a canned food item will have a chance to win one of many gift certificates from local businesses.

"We were surprised how many sponsors helped out," Cox said.

"We got gift certificates to Cold Stone, The Palace, Chipotle, Whisky Creek, Pizza Hut and many more."

All items collected will be donated to the Flint Hills Breadbasket, Cox said.

Holmes and Cox came up with the idea after watching Greek Idol, which was performed during last year's Greek Week.

"Ashley and I were talking about what event to do with the big budget we are given every year," Cox said.

"We had both thought about doing a talent show. During Greek Week last year was Greek Idol, and it went well."

After K-State Idol was planned, it was discovered this is not the first time that K-State has had a talent show for the students.

"I found out that this used to be a tradition at K-State until about the '80s," Holmes said. "We hope that this will be a tradition that many will be excited about for years to come."

Mathy said she thinks having a talent show every year would be beneficial.

"I think it would be awesome to have this be a tradition because it gives kids a chance to do what they really love," Mathy said.

Laughter helps couple overcome obstacles in relationship

PILLOW TALK

A weekly column discussing the issues of dating, relationships and sex.

The old saying goes, "all you need is love," but I think that it's a little bit off base.

I think the word love should be replaced with laughter.

NASRINA WILLIAMS

It is my experience that love cannot survive without an extremely healthy dose of laughter.

In order for a relationship to survive, the two people in the relationship need to be able to make each other laugh and have the ability to laugh at themselves.

The reason I fell in love with my husband was his ability to make me laugh.

He brings out my playfulness and makes me feel like a carefree kid again.

Hardly a day goes by that my husband does not make me laugh. We might not understand everything about each other's personalities, but we both truly get the other's sense of humor.

Our ability to be joking and playful about each other and ourselves gives us the ability to relieve tension in our relationship.

Everyone has some annoying characteristics, and if you live with that person, you are sure to notice them.

My husband is able to tolerate my anal-retentive, neat-freak, cleanliness compulsions because we can both laugh about it.

Similarly, I am able to handle my husband's pessimistic tendencies because we both make jokes about it.

I cannot count the number of time my husband and I have been in the middle of a full-fledged, knock-down, drag-out, battle of wills argument that was abruptly ended by uncontrollable laughter.

One of us either would accidentally or intentionally do or say something to make the other one laugh, and the disagreement was peacefully reconciled because laughter is guaranteed to diffuse anger.

When life throws challenges into our path, our relationship gives us the ability to be resilient.

As a young, married couple, money is a constant source of stress and difficulty.

There is never enough, and water heaters break when you least expect it.

By helping one another perceive the humor in such situations, we are able to deal with them without getting discouraged.

Love cannot survive without a healthy dose of laughter.

Passion is passing. Interests change. Nobody is perfect.

But if two people can make each other laugh, then their relationship will be able to withstand trials and changes.

Coalition, Sunset Zoo to honor veterans with events today

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To honor Veteran's Day, the Flint Hills Veteran's Coalition has a parade at 9:30 a.m., and Sunset Zoological Park has free admission from noon to 5 p.m.

At the end of World War I, an armistice was signed to end the war and all other wars.

This was signed the 11th hour of the 11th day on the 11th month.

Cecil Eyestone, publicity chairman and secretary of the Flint Hills Veteran's Coalition, said the purpose of the parade today is to express gratitude for peace and the members' desire for the continuance of healthy relations with all people.

Prior to the parade, there will be a breakfast at the American Legion building, 114 McCall Road.

The parade takes place at 9:30 a.m., and a commemorative program will take place at the Wareham Opera House at 11 a.m.

This is the 11th year the Flint Hills Veterans Coalition is sponsoring the parade. It began when Riley County dedicated a memorial to veterans on Nov. 11, 1992.

The parade has 84 entries, Eyestone said. The entries include: 11 color guards, 1,000 children from 14 schools, four marching bands, five floats, 20 car units, among others.

"This is what we have entered, but who knows how many of them will really show?" Eyestone said.

The commemorative ceremony following the parade will include the announcement of the winners from the poster, banner and essay contests.

"We already have the winners for two of the contests," Eyestone said. "The banners will be judged by the committee during the parade."

The program also will include a presentation of the colors by two American Legion Posts, patriotic music by Lee School children, remarks from Manhattan Mayor Mark Taussig and presentations from Alvin Johnson, chair of the Riley County Commissioners and Brigadier General Hardy from Fort Riley.

Eyestone said that following the day's activities, many of the veterans go to a presentation at St. George Elementary School.

"They have put on a special program for us veterans in the past, and we will go to speak to different classes over the course of the day," Eyestone said.

Eyestone said the Flint Hills Veteran's Coalition committee for the parade and Veteran's Day activities met at least 10 times.

"We put a lot of work into this for a long time. We hope that we have a big group of people that come to the activities," Eyestone said.

While the parade will end in the late morning, Sunset Zoo will keep the celebration going all day with free admission to everyone in honor of veterans.

Melissa Miller, marketing development officer for the zoo, said it's an annual event.

"In the past, we've had the Military Appreciation Day on the Saturday before or after Veteran's Day. We realized that because most people got the day off because it is a national holiday, we should honor our veterans on Veteran's Day," Miller said.

Miller said the Military Appreciation Day has been active for at least three years.

She said in lieu of the admission prices, zoo officials ask that everyone bring a non-perishable food item for the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"We collected several cans last year and hope to increase that donation this year," Miller said.

Rachel Soash, senior in wildlife biology and curator of education at the zoo, said this is a good excuse to visit the zoo.

"It is a good opportunity to get to the zoo. The animals are very active. In the summer they are hot and aren't active. The animals like cooler weather," she said.

History exhibit features K-State family

By Brenna Sandefur
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Agriculture isn't always considered an exciting topic, but for Katie Wilson, sophomore in agronomy, agriculture has brought her a claim to fame.

Wilson's family is featured in a Smithsonian National Museum of History exhibit in Hale Library called "Listening to the Prairie."

Because Hale has a nationally traveling Smithsonian exhibit visiting, Kearns said, security has increased.

"There have to be library employees on the floor with it at all times," Kearns said. "And we have security guards on the floor with it at night."

However, a fire alarm Monday that ended up being a false alarm, but the evacuation of the building brought up questions as to what would happen if the exhibit was destroyed.

"It's insured for fire," Kearns said, "but I'm not sure of a plan for getting it out of the building."

"It's cool to be in the exhibit," Wilson said. "People don't appreciate how special the prairie and the Flint Hills are."

The exhibit itself was organized by the Smithsonian National Museum of History. The American Library Association is coordinating and sponsoring its national tour.

"The exhibit is a study of the prairie," Kearns said. "It's an analysis of the agriculture and development of the prairie. The way farmers are interacting with the prairie is of pretty high ecological interest."

Different techniques farmers have used to try and preserve the prairie are featured in the exhibit.

Wilson's family has periodic burns to get rid of old growth and let native grasses thrive.

The point is to maximize the output of their land while still preserving the prairie.

Adams was a major part of filling out the application to get the exhibit.

"It deals so heavily with us because we are right in the middle of the Konza prairie," Adams said. "Not to mention that there is a K-State student actually in the exhibit."

Wilson's favorite part of being included of the exhibit was meeting the photographers who visited her family's land in Chase County, Kan.

"It was a unique experience. I drove them around and took them off-roading," Wilson said. "One of them memorized Shakespeare sonnets, and as we were driving around, with our heads hitting the ceiling of the truck, he would spout Shakespeare quotes about things like how beautiful the morning is."

There are other programs to attend in addition to this exhibit. On Nov. 18, Wes Jackson, president of the Land Institute, will be visiting Hale to speak about present-day agribusiness.

Soldier killed as U.S. steps up military operations in Iraq

By Slobodan Lekic
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Insurgents killed a U.S. military policeman, the U.S. command said Monday, and a top U.S. general sat down with local leaders in Iraq's most dangerous region to tell them attacks must stop.

"Irresponsible behavior such as explosions and strikes against coalition forces are prohibited, and we will take measures."

Taha Bedawi
FALLUJAH MAYOR

In Sadr City, a poor, mainly Shiite quarter of eastern Baghdad, witnesses said a U.S. soldier shot and killed the head of the district's U.S.-appointed municipal council in a weekend altercation.

Gen. John Abizaid, head of the U.S. Central Command, met over the weekend with mayors and tribal leaders of Anbar province – where the so-called Sunni Triangle, scene of the heaviest anti-U.S. resistance is located – an Iraqi who attended the meeting said Monday.

Abizaid pointed to Fallujah, one of the main towns in the Sunni Triangle, as a hot area and warned that if the city refuses to cooperate in the rebuilding process, there might be another policy, Fallujah Mayor Taha Bedawi told The Associated Press.

The general did not specify the new measures, but told the local leaders in Saturday's meeting, "Irresponsible behavior such as explosions and strikes against coalition forces are prohibited and we will take measures. We have the capabilities and equipment," Bedawi said.

Elsewhere, U.S. forces seized nearly 1,000 rockets during weekend raids in Tikrit and Beiji, north of Baghdad, the 4th Infantry Division said Monday.

TENURE | Professor fails to meet requirements

Wiest was notified in May of 1999 that his faculty appointment would be terminated due to unsatisfactory job performance.

"This is the first and only time we have dismissed a tenured faculty member under this policy," K-State Provost James Coffman said.

Charles Reagan, associate to the president at K-State, said Wiest was in violation of section C31.5-31.8 of the guidelines for tenured faculty for minimum performance standards.

"When a person is below minimum standards, the department head reports to the dean, and the person is given an opportunity to get some form of remediation for whatever reason the performance is low," Reagan said.

The policy is based on a four-point scale, and the ratings in each category are averaged.

"In every department, the faculty devises the instrument of evaluation, and it must be approved by the dean and the university administration and then it is reviewed by various officials around the campus," said Thomas Warner, head of the Department of Horticulture.

Reagan said this remediation might come in the form of help with class slides, syllabus writing or even help in obtaining outside funding for research projects.

Wiest refused to accept any assistance from administration in rectifying his situation.

According to the court's memorandum opinion, Wiest admitted that "his efforts to generate outside funding amounted to a 'minimum effort.'" He also said that "despite being warned about the need to generate outside funds, he did not attempt to submit proposals that would have generated the necessary funding."

Coffman said Wiest might have been able to keep his job had he not declined this assistance.

"We have had a number of people who have redeveloped their career under this policy," Coffman said.

Coffman said Wiest had every opportunity to improve his performance.

"That was the goal, but he just didn't respond to that," he said.

Reagan said the policy stipulates that faculty members who fall below standards set by their department in two consecutive years or three times in five years can be terminated by cause.

"Tenured faculty have the right to a hearing in front of a panel of tenured faculty called the Appendix M exam from the university handbook," Reagan said.

This faculty panel, Reagan said, upheld Coffman's recommendation, and K-State President Jon Wefald accepted the panel's decision.

"The case first went to district court and lost, and then he appealed that decision, and the state appeals court upheld the district court's ruling," he said.

Kenton Born, freshman in computer science, and Kevin McBeth, freshman in computer science and math, juggle torches to show interested students what the Juggling Club has to offer. It took Born and McBeth many years of practice to learn the proper way to juggle fire.

JUGGLING | Club members practice weekly to gain experience

Juggling can be an expensive hobby.

Juggling balls sell at $10 apiece, and bats, knives and torches all are about $35.

Born and McBeth each own more than $1,000 worth of equipment. Their commitment to juggling is an attribute for anyone who wants to show up to any of the club's meetings, which are from 6 to 8 p.m. every Thursday in the Union Courtyard.

"Between those of us who have been doing it a long time, we have enough props. People can just show up," McBeth said.

Bradburn, who will teach a juggling class through University For Mankind next semester, said the most difficult part of juggling is the initial learning.

"Juggling is all about the throw," Bradburn said. "If you throw perfectly, you don't have to think about it."

As experienced as these guys are – mistakes still happen. Born was juggling throwing axes during the Little Apple Festival when he cut his finger.

"I didn't think too much of it when I had gotten cut. I just wiped off the blood, picked them up and started juggling again," he said. "It started bleeding too much, though, so I had to stop juggling for 30 minutes."

Lindsay "Elle" Hoover, sophomore in open-option, is a featured twirler for the K-State Marching Band who has been attending Juggling Club meetings since discovering it last month.

"I found myself skimming through all the KSU clubs and organizations, and when I saw that K-State had a juggling club, I couldn't help but laugh," she said. "I immediately had visions of clowns and circus freaks hanging out at the Union throwing things at each other."

GAS PRICES | Finding ways to conserve energy can help with bills

Rosemary Foreman, public information for KCC, said the cold weather rule applies to everyone, regardless of income. However, it's different for students who don't have the utility in their names.

"If gas is in the landlord's name, and they pay it through rent, the rule won't have an impact on how a student will pay bills," Foreman said.

She said there are many ways to save money on heating costs.

"You've got to try and conserve. Turn the thermostat down, and if it is a sunny day, pull the blinds up and let the sun shine in," Foreman said.

Laurie Webster, communications manager for Kansas Gas Services, agreed.

"You can partially close vents, but it may not be a good idea to close them all the way," Webster said. "Wash clothes with cold water, rather than hot because it uses lots of energy to heat the water. There are several ways to save money."

Webster said that if a person will be gone for a long time, they should set the heat at 58 degrees because they can't turn off the thermostat completely. She said the water heater should be set at 120 degrees.

"If you are going home for Christmas break or are going on a long vacation over the winter, you should work with your energy sources accordingly," Webster said.

Webster said renters should work with their landlords to save money on energy.

"Talk with your landlord. Weather stripping, caulking and checking the filter in the furnace can save money that shouldn't be left up to the renter," she said.

How to Set up a payment plan with your utility company

1. Call them.
2. Give them facts to set up a payment agreement.
3. Pay one-twelfth of what you owe, pay in full the disconnect and reconnect bill and agree to pay the rest of the bill over the next 11 months.
4. If you are behind or illegally using services, make proper arrangements with your utility company.

the media is being unfair to Bryant.

"I think the media is feeding on him because he had never done anything wrong before," Townsel said. "In the end, this whole thing will have a negative effect on his appearance and money."

Kali Sallman, senior in public relations, said he can't help but watch the drama unfold.

"I believe it is the celebrity appeal and the fact that Bryant was supposed to be such a good guy."

Sallman said it is sad how much attention people pay when celebrities act up.

"We are dumb and bored Americans," Sallman said. "Its sad to say, but we love it when famous people get in trouble. I am certainly no different."

Scott Robinson, a Denver defense attorney, has said it is doubtful, though, that Bryant will be convicted.

"The reality is that unless there is significantly more substantial evidence available at trial," Robinson said, "a conviction looks like a completely unlikely scenario."

"...no matter what the outcome, people will always doubt the verdict and it will haunt Kobe for the rest of his career."

JUNIOR IN MARKETING

Liz Youness, junior in marketing, agrees.

"I think the girl is lying," Youness said. "But there was an allegation, and he was accused, so no matter the outcome, people will always doubt the verdict and it will haunt Kobe for the rest of his career."

A rape victim's story

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Laura McAtee was raped Oct. 14, 2000, in her Kansas hometown. She met the assailant through a local church group. Laura, senior in graphic design, went to the church group hoping to make some friends. Instead, she met Joe.

Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN

Laura McAtee was a victim of rape. She kept the clothes she was wearing the day she was raped for a while, but when they wore out she didn't know what to do with them. She couldn't throw them away because they meant something to her. So she ripped up her khaki pants and burgundy shirt and made a piece of art describing her emotions. McAtee said it was very therapeutic to tear the clothing.

They met and started talking for a while. They talked on the phone and hung out a few times.

She doesn't remember much of what happened that night.

Laura and Joe went to McDonald's, and Laura said she needed to get money for gas. She got money from her house, but he distracted her and she ran out of gas just as they were pulling up to the residence halls where Joe lived.

"I'm pretty sure he had that in mind," she said.

She went up to Joe's room with him to call a friend to come get her.

That was at 11:30 p.m. She didn't leave until a few hours later.

Laura doesn't remember how her clothes got off or many other details. She just remembers thinking, 'I want to get out of here.' The way he set it up, she didn't even realize what had happened.

When it did happen, it just wasn't anything like she had expected, and it really didn't seem right. She remembers him pulling out, flicking his penis because it was still kind of hard, and grinning. She remembers going to the bathroom and getting her clothes.

Then Joe seemed like he wanted her out of there.

Laura called her friend to pick her up. While she waited for a ride, she stood outside and sang to herself.

When she got home, she wasn't able to sleep all night.

It was a Saturday night, so she got herself up the next morning and went to church like always. But she felt kind of weird about going to church. It was the day after, and she hadn't realized what had happened yet. She just thought it was "really bad sex."

Laura was a virgin prior to that night. At the time, she was having lots of problems with her family. Her parents just divorced, and she was adjusting to the new family situation.

She said Joe had used the night to control her.

He used his body to make her feel bad about herself – the way she talked and walked and dressed – any little thing. She thought he gained more territory when he violated her like that.

To make things worse, she would see him on her local community college campus, and he would be mean to her. One of Laura's close friends saw his behavior and thought something wasn't right.

Laura had been talking to friends about the night, and several of them said it sounded like a rape. About a month after the incident, she went with two friends to visit local police, campus police, women from Laura's church and women at the local crisis center.

She went through the reporting process, and later police told her they confronted Joe and asked him if the incident happened. Joe admitted to having sex with Laura but didn't admit that it was rape.

Laura thinks that, to this day, Joe doesn't understand what he did and how much he hurt her.

Because there was more than a month between the incident and her decision to report it, police weren't able to gather any physical evidence.

"The way the law is, it's hard to press charges for rape. It broke down to a he-said/she-said thing, which doesn't hold water," she said. "That kind of hurt – like they didn't believe me. I could tell very well that the sheriff and ladies from the crisis center believed me."

Laura said this experience makes her feel scared for other women.

"He's going to do it again. I would really like to see him behind bars and keep him away," she said. "Keep him from hurting somebody else. I'm pretty sure he's done it before."

For a while, Laura fell into a deep depression.

"I just really wanted to die," she said. "I think the turning point for me was when I moved up here. I had been with a guy for a while because I thought he really wanted me. After the rape I felt worthless, and to believe someone wanted me, that was enough."

Laura said she got pregnant about two years ago and moved to Manhattan after graduating from the community college. Here, at K-State,

Wefald sets goal for study abroad program

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State President Jon Wefald said that by 2005 he wants 10 percent of K-State students to be studying abroad.

Wefald was not available for comment on this issue.

With only 80 students currently studying abroad, the leap to sending roughly 2,000 students overseas seems like a jump – a jump that might have some negative consequences.

Scott Jones, interim Greek Affairs co-coordinator and assistant dean of student life, said he believes there is going to be an impact on greek houses.

Jones said the impact will not be sudden, but a gradual increase every year. He does not believe the increase in study-abroad students will cause any of the chapters to have to close.

"It's speculative and premature to say that this might lead to the demise of a chapter," he said.

Jones said he believes studying abroad is an important opportunity for students that allows them to expand their horizons.

"This is an important opportunity for students and the university," he said. "We need to look at all aspects, the opportunities and challenges, so we can manage them responsibly."

However, Charles Reagan, associate to the president, said the increase in study abroad students should not have a huge effect on residence halls and greek houses.

"Only about half of the students who are enrolled are living on campus," he said.

Derek Jackson, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services, agreed that the increase in study-abroad students should not have a huge effect on the residence halls. He said this is because there are several study-abroad students from other countries currently living in the residence halls.

"It's a two way street with students," he said.

Jackson said residence halls also offer

ISRAEL SETS NEW RECORD FOR CONSECUTIVE DAYS WITHOUT BOMBS

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Ariel Sharon declared a national holiday yesterday as Israel celebrated its 10th consecutive day without a car bomb, a new national record.

"This is an unprecedented day in Israel's history," Sharon said in a speech to the Knesset, Israel's parliament. "Obviously, the Palestinians have fallen asleep on the job."

Sharon credited a new military offensive, Operation Spike, as responsible for the lull in violence. The operation centers around distracting Palestinian insurgents with free broadcasts of cheap cable aimed toward lewd men.

In response to Operation Spike, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat reportedly cursed his top suicide bombers, ordering new strikes to commence as soon as the latest episode of "Stripperella" ends.

WHITE HOUSE POLLS SHOW PRAISE FOR BUSH

WASHINGTON, D.C. – White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan announced a recent phone poll of random American voters showed a high approval rating for President Bush and the handling of the war on terrorism.

Of a random survey of 2,000 Americans who voted in the past election, 51 percent responded that they "don't not greatly undisapprove" of the President's handling of the duties of his office. McClellan further broke down the results.

"President Bush also garnered a great deal of praise, as 99.9 percent of respondents also said they were in favor of liberty, peace, justice, sunshine and cute kittens," McClellan said.

When asked to explain the link between those items and Bush, McClellan was deathly silent as Department of Justice officials escorted the curious reporter out of the pressroom to a "special briefing area."

McClellan also announced that the late Joan Kroc, who donated $200 million to National Public Radio, has been added to the Axis of Evil, as well as all other NPR contributors.

SGA TO ENDORSE COUPLE FOR WEDDING CONTEST

Student Senate last night announced at its weekly meeting that instead of voicing a stance on Mayor Mark Taussig's Marriage Proclamation, it instead will endorse one of the candidate couples in the Collegian's Once in a Lifetime Plans a Wedding.

"We don't want to make any waves," said Kyle Harris, senator in the College of Engineering. "We'd rather focus on something that won't offend anyone, something nice and noncontroversial. I mean, everyone loves weddings, right?"

Senate will announce next week which couple they endorse.

The endorsement of a candidate couple likely means Senate will table the Marriage Proclamation issue indefinitely, but Yvette Elliott, senator in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, said Senate doesn't want to offend any of its constituents.

"We like to think of ourselves as neutral in this situation. It's like, if student organizations were members of the United Nations, we'd be Switzerland," Elliott said.

"Issues like the Marriage Proclamation are a touchy subject, and we'd rather stick to allocating funds for lacrosse team roadtrips. You know, stuff like that."

NATO CEDES FRANCE BACK TO GERMANY

BRUSSELS – In a historic announcement, President George W. Bush apologized to the world community for a tragic American mistake dating back to World War II.

"I wish to express my sincere regret, and that of all Americans, to our fellow members in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, to countless small African nations and to the entire world when I say we are deeply sorry for driving the Germans out of France and restoring French sovereignty," Bush said.

"Therefore, we have decided to rectify this 60-year-old mistake by ceding the entire territory of France back to Germany," he said.

Since France is not a voting member of NATO's military council, President Jacques Chirac was left sputtering in his Paris office with no one to listen.

Bush also promised to end French involvement in African affairs as he signed a NATO order transferring control of all French military forces abroad and the French Foreign Legion to retired terrorist, sometimes-dictator and international funnyman Bob Denard.

Prescription drugs abused; concerns rising among parents

By Oksana Boyko
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Soon after midnight, a 24-hour study area on the first floor of Hale Library starts subsiding into sleep.

Students slumber inside deep armchairs, snore with their heads over books or see dreams with their bodies stretched on the floor. A few people who are still awake drink coffee and soda, but their movements are slow and languid as if in a slow-motion video.

Staying awake when there is too little time and too much to study can be a problem.

Students fight sleep with steaming cups and bubbling bottles, while others turn to over-the-counter medications orillegally distributed prescription drugs.

"I know people who take Ritalin, but I don't," said one K-State student who asked for anonymity. "In my fraternity house, there were seven or eight guys who got pills from two guys who actually had a prescription."

The student said that depending on the nature of relationships between fraternity members, sometimes pills were given for free, other times they were sold. The student added that this fraternity house is located in Kansas, but not in Manhattan.

Ritalin, along with Adderall and Dexadrine, are the most common drugs prescribed to treat Attention Deficit (Hyperactivity) Disorder. According to the National Institute of Mental Health, about 3 to 5 percent of the general population has the disorder, which is characterized by agitated behavior and an inability to focus on tasks.

Roy Wendt, sophomore in business administration, said he was diagnosed with ADD a few years ago and was prescribed Adderall.

"It helps me concentrate," Wendt said of the drug.

He added that nobody had ever asked him for a pill. "Maybe that's because I don't tell anybody that I have it," Wendt said.

ADHD medications are considered prone to misuse and – when improperly used – highly addictive, which led to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration categorizing it as Schedule II controlled substances. Being in this group implies stringent controls on the drugs' manufacture, distribution, and prescription.

Nevertheless, there is a growing concern among parents, educators and health professionals about misuse and abuse of ADHD medications.

According to the National Institute of Drug Abuse, numerous cases of Ritalin misuse were reported in 1999-2000 in Baltimore, Boston, Minneapolis and Phoenix. In 1999, some 165 Retalin-related poison calls were made in Detroit; 419 such cases were reported in Texas, with 114 of those involving intentional misuse or abuse.

A recent General Accounting Office survey found that 8 percent of schools in the United States report students selling or misusing attention-deficit disorder drugs during the 2000-2001 school year.

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drugs Education Service, said some K-State students admitted using ADHD drugs as non-prescribed study aids.

"I know it's been done in K-State because I have clients who told me that, but it's very small percentage of K-State students," Arck said.

Arck said some students might take ADHD medications to improve their workability before tests, but these stimulants might have the opposite effect.

"The problem with Ritalin is that when one snorts it, instead of staying awake and alert, a person becomes hyperactive," he said. "It's more toward a cocaine high than to a caffeine high."

Lt. Troy Lane of the K-State Police, said the last case involving illicit use of ADHD medications had been three or four years ago. He refused to discuss specifics of the case.

Lane said selling controlled drugs or having them without prescription is a felony.

According to the Kansas Legislature, sale or distribution of ADHD medications carry a possible jail sentence up to 51 months and a maximum $300,000 fine.

Unlawful possession of these stimulants can lead to a maximum penalty of one year in prison and $2,500 fine.

Actual penalties are decided by courts based prior criminal record.

Along with concerns about ADHD drugs misuse being on the rise, the number of prescriptions written annually for Ritalin, Adderall and Dexadrine has skyrocketed over the last decade.

In 1991, about 2,000 Ritalin prescriptions a year were written nationwide. In 2002, according to IMS Health, a health care information company, more than 19 million prescriptions were dispensed for all ADHD drugs.

Some health professionals attribute this steep increase to ADHD being over-diagnosed.

"I think we are overreacting about over-diagnosing of ADHD," said Ann Johnson, psychologist with University Counseling Services.

"There are people with ADHD without learning problems, and people with learning problems without ADHD. But the large percentage have both," Johnson said.

Johnson said that while the percentage of K-State students with ADHD does not differ from its proportion in general population, in the last three to five years there has been an increase in the number of students with this syndrome.

"In the recent years, there have been more children born and diagnosed with ADHD," Johnson said.

She said the increase in ADHD occurrence and diagnosis has several reasons: environmental toxicity, increased number of people taking drugs, and a better awareness of this syndrome.

Wireless number portability to start

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finally, you can take it with you.

The Federal Communications Commission has passed a rule allowing wireless local number portability, which will allow cellular phone users to keep their phone number when switching wireless providers. Customers also will be able to switch to a home phone number or vice versa.

Chelsea Fallon, news media consultant for the FCC, said this applies to all wireless companies.

She said the rule will take effect Nov. 24 for the top 100 Metropolitan Statistical Areas. Kansas City and Wichita fall into this group. Smaller MSAs will have until May 24 or six months after a number is requested, whichever is later.

"Consumers can begin making requests from their carriers," Fallon said.

Fallon said number portability was part of the 1996 Telecommunication Act. They decided in 1997-98 that portability should apply to wireless as well. The November and May deadlines were decided in July 2002.

In addition, there could be fees involved, she said.

"Carriers are allowed to recover their cost," she said. "They are allowed to do that however they choose."

She said there could be line-item charges or switching fees.

Nathan Gray, senior sales representative for Sprint in Manhattan, said there are a lot of software updates to be made – especially for smaller companies.

"It's new technology coming around," he said. "There's a lot of stuff to do because our databases aren't as big."

Gray said companies would have preferred not to have number portability.

"No company really wants to do that," he said. "FCC brought it up, and they enforce it."

Phone companies are expecting a lot of phone number transfers in the beginning, Gray said.

"It's going to have its ups and downs," he said. "For a while, I think it will hurt. Each company is probably going to have a lot of leaving."

Transferring numbers between wireless companies will require a lot more processing, Gray said.

"It'll take more time," he said. "People aren't going to get their number as soon as they can get there. That can be a disadvantage."

He said processing will take anywhere from a couple of hours to 14 days because the company the customer is switching from will have to clear the number and release it to the company they are switching to.

Jon Kohrs, senior in management information systems, said he has had cellular service with a local company for about four years. He has never switched companies before and said he is content with his service.

Kohrs said he is not sure whether he will switch carriers, but it would depend on what offers other companies advertise.

"I would think about it. Having the same number is definitely an incentive," he said.

Study abroad program will have negative effect on fraternities

TO THE POINT

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Paul Restivo
Katie Lane
James Hurla
Abbie Whited
Edie Hall
Andrew Lawson
Dave Skretta
Rachel Krier
Corbin H. Crable
Chris Harrop

Wefald's initiative to have 10 percent of students studying abroad might negatively affect fraternities, and the university has made no plans to help them.

If Wefald's projection comes to fruition, a fraternity with 70 members will have seven studying abroad, thus costing the fraternity thousands of dollars and making recruitment more difficult.

K-State's current marketing strategy for student housing consists only of promoting residence halls. Though an increase in foreign students studying at K-State might also increase, those students most likely will not be recruited to live in fraternities.

Why? The university housing system will not receive their money if fraternity living is promoted.

It is the way the university has done business since the inception of the greek system, and this initiative to send more students abroad only will escalate the already-struggling recruitment efforts of K-State's fraternities.

What can be done?

Nothing can nor will be done by the university.

The Office of Greek Affairs needs to draw more attention to this issue and devise a recruitment plan for fraternities – a plan to, if needed, recruit these foreign students studying in Manhattan. This change in studying abroad will have drastic effects on fraternities. Recruitment efforts will save them.

Biting the hand that feeds me news

Broadcast news fails to offer quality products

CHRIS HARROP

I have no faith in broadcast journalism.

Not to disparage any students studying and striving for a career in radio or television, but the reality of modern broadcast journalism sickens me.

I used to watch the local news every night growing up – Peter Jennings at 5:30, followed by the local broadcast at 6 p.m. To an unsuspecting child, this seemed like getting an education. To a cynical adult, it is dreck.

Local TV news broadcasts often provide a unique aspect to stories in ways that print and radio cannot. Far too often their focus goes toward sensationalist stories.

Anyone who watches local TV news broadcasts for a month will notice some of these particular news items.

A failed reporter up in a news helicopter continuously checks commuter traffic. Security videos capture a child being beaten up on a school bus. Dangerous roadway chases with police in hot pursuit interrupt all else.

Keeping an eye on traffic might be a worthwhile service, but video footage of schoolboy fights and police chases belong on prime-time Fox specials, not local news. These events do not have an effect on our lives.

Another failed creation of local TV news broadcasts: the "problem-solver." While journalism often is said to be the spark that causes people to be active, "problem-solver" reporters take it a step further. They seek out "injustices" and harass the companies and individuals supposedly at fault.

Never mind that most municipalities have some form of the Better Business Bureau – you can go to the "problem-solvers" instead and get on television in the process.

Accompanying this circus of melodramatic pseudo-journalism is an entire cast of players.

Whether stations actively try to or not, a cult of personality develops around the anchors and reporters when, in the end, they are no more important than the mind-numbing segments they produce.

In case you get tired of the anchors and reporters, they seem new when the station redesigns its studio every six months. They also change their slogan from "Live at Five" to "News First" or "Action News" to sound relevant.

In the meantime, meaningful stories are given mere lip service. Martin Kaplan, associate dean of the University of Southern California's Annenberg School for Communication, found public issue coverage is severely lacking.

In testimony before the Senate Commerce Committee, Kaplan said he found nearly half of the local coverage of the 2002 elections made no mention of issues. Rather, they focused on poll numbers and campaign strategies.

While most of the aforementioned qualms I have concern television, radio broadcasts share many of the same unenviable traits minus the visual component.

While National Public Radio still provides some of the most balanced news coverage in radio, it is alone against the behemoth of editorialized talk radio.

For every NPR station, you easily can find about 1,000 Rush Limbaugh types who have no regard for actual journalistic standards. The sports-talk universe is even worse, as listeners call in comments regularly tinged with racism and misogyny.

Media such as television and radio can be wonderful things, but the negative aspects of modern news coverage still leave much to be desired.

Until something changes, I will stick to the deadwood news and bloggers.

Don't face fears without considering consequences

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

Huddled behind the viewfinder of my camera, I watched a small dot hurdle toward the ground.

As the dot drew closer, it took on the shape of a large parachute. Under the parachute, my roommate, Rogie, screamed with delight and fear.

She pulled the brake cord on her parachute and her feet hit the ground. As her weary parachute caught small gusts of wind, it sank to the grass behind her.

Jumping up and down, Rogie hugged me while screaming, "I did it, I did it!"

Rogie had fulfilled a personal dream by skydiving for the first time.

She prepared for this day the right way – by attending skydiving class and watching other jumpers.

As I watched students jumping out of a Cessna, several jumpers asked me if I was skydiving. When I replied, "Not a prayer," an instructor said I should face my fear of heights.

He informed me that jumping out of an airplane is a different relationship to the ground. He gave a convincing argument that skydiving was different than being on a tall building or a roller coaster.

For some, facing a fear of falling could be important, but with my track record, it would be taunting fate. Here are several reasons why I shouldn't jump out of moving objects.

FIRST DISASTER

It started the year I turned 4. Chasing my brothers in our tree house, I misstepped and crashed to the hard ground. Covered in blood, I ran screaming into the house and gave my mother her first panic attack. After two surgeries and rehabilitation to regain the full use of my left arm, I was back in action.

SECOND DISASTER

Less than a year later, I learned how to ride a bike. Flying down the street, my wheel bumped the curb and I once again crashed to the ground. A neighbor heard me scream, called my mom and gave her a second panic attack. A quick trip to the hospital verified the worst – I had broken my left arm again.

THIRD DISASTER

Fully recovered from disasters one and two, I decided to overcome my growing fear of heights and falling. I figured the only way to squelch my fears was to climb the massive pecan tree in our front yard.

I resolutely climbed branch after branch with a growing sense of accomplishment and pride – I had conquered my fear! However, while conquering my fear I forgot about having to climb down from the tree.

When my father walked outside and saw me perched 50 feet above the ground he begged for me to climb down, but I couldn't do it. My father sighed and placed a call to the Bolivar County Electric Company to retrieve me from the tree.

When making an important decision to face personal demons, people should always look at the pros and cons. I'm sure it would be great to overcome my fear of heights, but I obviously am meant to stay on the ground.

I will concede to flying when I am required to travel thousands of miles. As far as purposely free-falling goes, you can count me out.

You won't see me scaling a mountain or jumping out of an airplane, but anyone who wants to should do some research first.

Kirk Jones, the man who took a 173-foot plunge off Niagara Falls, is a good example of a moron. He went over the waterfall without a safety device or a life jacket.

He miraculously lived, but not everyone can count on miracles.

Knowing the boundaries between facing your fears and begging to die is important when deciding whether to "take the plunge."

SURVIVOR | Advice on reporting crime, grieving for victims

she didn't have any friends or close family.

"I was pregnant, didn't have my own place to live, didn't have a job. I just turned to the Bible and found comfort in that," she said. "When I moved up here, I sought out another counselor who has helped me tremendously. A lot of it has been figuring out how I can help myself and just trying to put things in perspective."

Laura has since written several poems and created several works of art which she said help her express her emotions. She has a two-inch thick black binder in which she keeps her creations, along with handouts, news articles and scripture passages. All of the information relates to rape – statistics, prevention, counseling and ways in which media portray sexual violence.

"For a while it was really hard to trust guys," she said. "I don't think it's so much of a problem now. I might have my days, though, where I'm like, 'if you have a penis, stay away from me.' I've gotten to where I can be pretty open about it."

Unfortunately, rape has become a very active word in her vocabulary, Laura said.

"But I'm using it for good things. I'm doing research and talking about it. It's a matter of putting things into perspective – how does it fit into everybody's daily lives," she said. "It happens every day to people we know. It happens everywhere. I see more willingness on people's part to see there's a problem and willingness to change how we see ourselves and see each other."

Laura said she still wonders what's wrong with men who commit sexually violent acts.

"From what I understand, most don't know that what they're doing is rape," she said. "If more women shared their stories, perhaps more women would share their stories and help bring into light what's going on. I can't say what would decrease the instances of rape because I can't make a guy choose to do or not choose to do something. I really don't know what it would take."

As time passes, life gets better for Laura.

"Yes, it has happened. It's part of who I am, but it's not who I am. I am not a rape victim," she said. "I'm grieving as I need to grieve. You have your times when you need to cry, and I do that as it's necessary.

"Part of this is realizing you have to be OK with that and deciding what to do with it. You can let it destroy your life, or you can overcome."

Laura hopes her future holds a relationship with a man and more children. She wants to graduate from K-State and teach rape awareness workshops.

"Life's going pretty well. I've adjusted to my life as a mother fairly well. I have a 16-month-old daughter. I'm getting through school," she said. "I am going to get better. I am going to show everyone I am not a victim. I am the conqueror."

"So much of it is dealing with shame and feeling worthless. You have to come to a point where you don't care who knows what happened."

Laura McAtee
SURVIVOR OF RAPE ATTACK

LAURA'S ADVICE

"To females, I would get out of the situation first of all and call somebody you trust – whether it's a friend or family member and get to the hospital. Do one of the rape kits," she said. "Probably report it to the police as soon as possible. You can decide later if you wish to press charges."

Get into counseling as soon as possible, she said.

"For a while, it's just going through the motions and just dealing with it, which is very hard to do. It also might be helpful to talk with other people who have suffered from sexual violence. It's just helpful to know you're not alone, and there is light at the end of the tunnel – that there is hope," she said. "Just take care of yourself. You have to do a lot of taking care of yourself for a while."

Laura said she thinks many women have suffered some sort of sexual violence and just don't do anything about it.

"They just don't know anything about it. I think statistics are low," she said. "The way we are conditioned and cultures, sex sells, and women are objects. It's very easy for rape to go unnoticed. I know in college, partying is a big thing, but you're asking for trouble when you mix drugs and alcohol."

Drugs or alcohol were not involved in her situation, Laura said.

She also hopes others who have been exposed to violence find a way to purge their anger and frustrations.

"For anyone who has suffered rape, it's important to find some avenue of expression," she said.

Another part of recovery is coming to a point where of not being ashamed by what happened, she said. That is why Laura decided to tell her story.

"So much of it is dealing with shame and feeling worthless. To some extent you almost have to make yourself do it whether you want to or not," she said. "You have to come to a point where you don't care who knows what happened."

Grandson of Phog Allen bumped to new seats in Allen Fieldhouse

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE, Kan. – The grandson of legendary University of Kansas basketball coach Forrest "Phog" Allen lost his prime seats at Allen Fieldhouse, and he isn't sure how long he'll be able to keep the new seats he was given seven rows higher up.

"I can't say for sure, but there's a possibility that we'll either lose or have to give up our tickets – tickets that have been in our family since 1955," Allen said.

Allen's grandfather coached for 39 seasons at Kansas, where he compiled 590 victories and a national championship in 1952. And Phog Allen is the namesake for the fieldhouse.

Allen said his four tickets – fourth row, across from the Kansas bench – were in jeopardy because university policies prohibit sons and daughters from inheriting their parents' tickets.

Allen's father, longtime Lawrence city attorney Milton "Mitt" Allen, died in 1988. When his mother, Isabel Allen, died last spring, the family's tickets went up for grabs.

Allen said he's not bitter over being moved from his previous seats, but he's a bit miffed about how the change came about.

"What happened was, they sent me the order form like they had before and I sent in the $2,400 for four tickets," said Allen, who said he has missed no more than four or five games since 1970. "Several weeks went by and I noticed the check hadn't cleared, so I called, and they said this was a change-of-ownership situation and that a committee would determine who would get them.

"I was told someone would be getting back to me," he said. "But another four weeks went by and I still hadn't heard anything, so I called again. And that's when they told me my seats had already been sold."

He said he wasn't given the opportunity to match or bid against the new ticket holder's offer.

"That hurt, definitely," he said. "You know, I can understand why they did it, and I know they need the money – I am not naive about this. But it was handled in such an almost-cavalier manner. That's what bothers me."

"There's a possibility that we'll either lose or have to give up our tickets — tickets that have been in our family since 1955."

Forrest Allen
GRANDSON OF UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS BASKETBALL COACH FORREST "PHOG" ALLEN

He said he's not sure if he would be able to keep his tickets next year if the Kansas Athletic Corp. follows through on plans to adopt a point system for determining who is sold which tickets.

Though the switch is only in the discussion stage and has not been approved, several season ticket holders, including Allen, have been told to expect to pay $5,000 for every pair of season tickets in the prime seating area and $10,000 for every four tickets.

Earlier this year, 121 season ticket holders who had fallen behind in their payments to the Williams Fund were sent letters telling them they had to put up $5,000 or $10,000 to keep their seats. Five of those 121 are plaintiffs in a lawsuit accusing the corporation of abusing its authority.

If he's pressed for $5,000, Allen, an attorney in private practice, said he would try to come up with the money, but he didn't know for how long.

Jim Marchiony, associate director of athletics at the university, said he looked into the handling of Allen's season tickets and came away with the impression that Allen "was taken care of very, very well."

Allen insists he wasn't mad.

"It was handled in a way that, for me, was hurtful," he said. "And he is right, I was taken care of, and I'm not alienated from the university. I'm not mad, and if they go to the $5,000 deal – I'll still be a fan, a huge fan, but it will be difficult to be as unequivocal about the Jayhawks as I am now."

Angel in the infield: Royals Berroa wins Rookie of the Year honors

WES MARFIELD

What a season it was.

The Kansas City Royals, coming off of a 100-loss season, put themselves in the driver's seat in the AL Central pennant race before being edged out by the hated Twins.

In the end, though, I could only look back with a smile.

On Monday, however, that smile took the proportions that of the famous Grinch who stole Christmas as I read that Angel Berroa received AL Rookie of the Year honors.

It only gets better. He beat out a damned Yankee en route to winning.

Hideki "Godzilla" Matsui finished in a close second, but the key word there is second. Eat that, Yankees fans.

Berroa earned the right to call himself the league's best rookie. Playing shortstop, arguably the toughest position on the field aside from pitcher, he overcame early difficulties to step into a leadership role and take his team somewhere nobody, myself included, thought they could go.

I applaud the Baseball Writers of America for bypassing a media bias toward the Yankees and looking toward middle America.

With all of the hype surrounding Matsui and his arrival in the Bronx, he seemed destined from the start to dominate Major League Baseball like fellow import Ichiro Suzuki.

But the baseball gods had other plans.

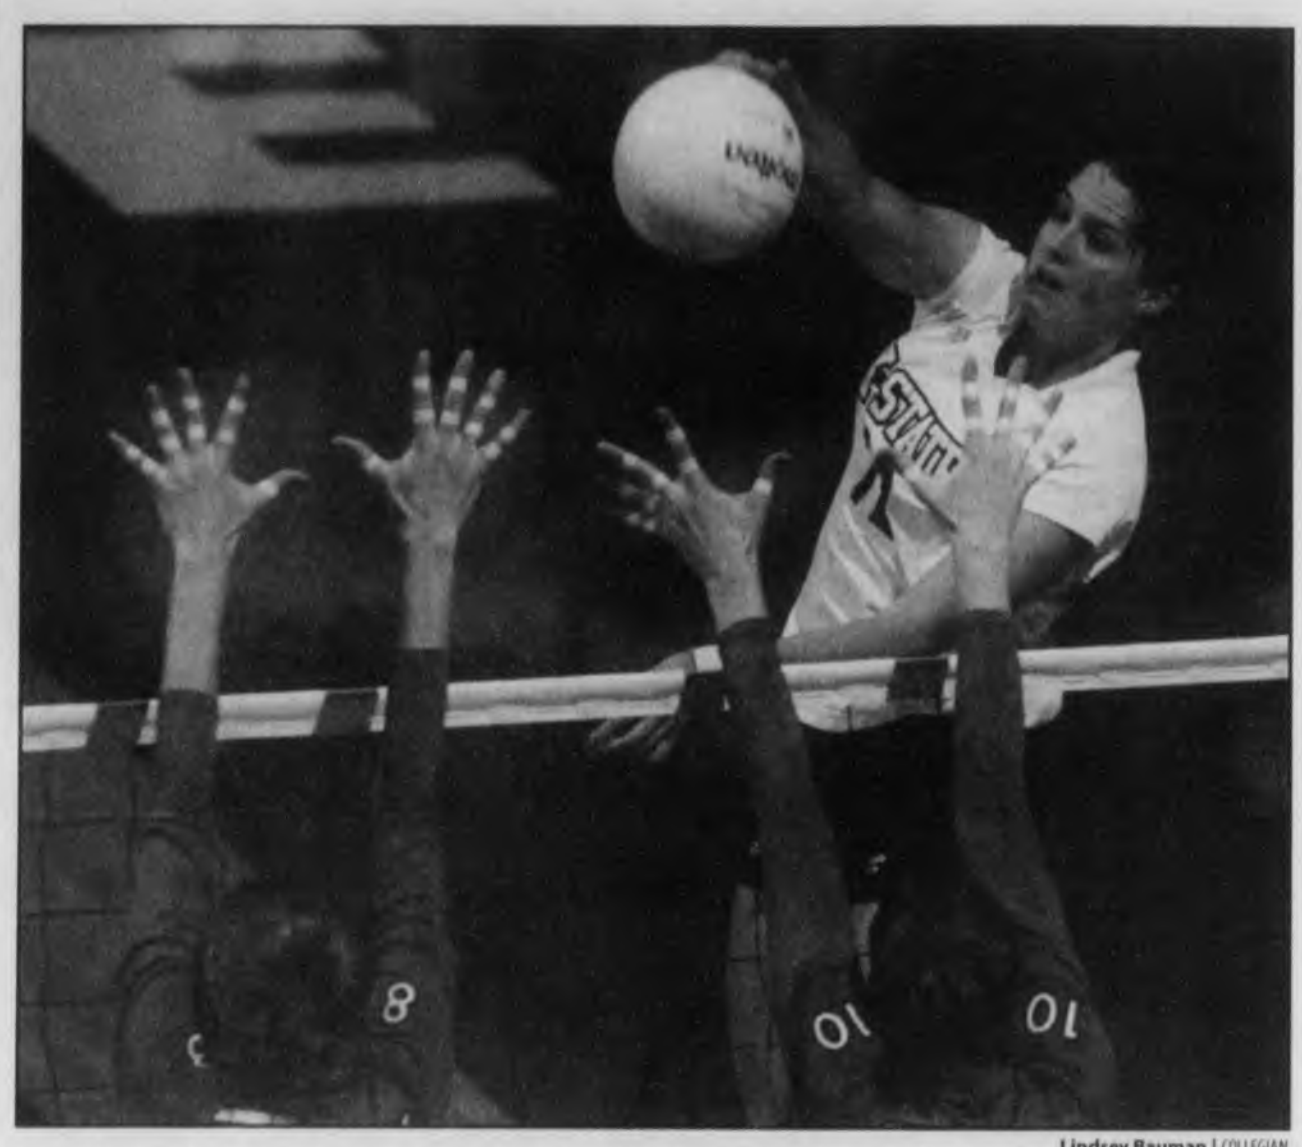
Matsui was able to collect 106 RBI this year, an impressive number for a rookie. However, the all-around play of Berroa was too much and the Yankees once again finished in second place.

I think Berroa more than deserved the honor, but part of me still knows there is another reason I'm happy he won.

As much as I love the Royals, I hate the Yankees even more.

I can't quite put my finger on from where my hatred stems, but it probably has something to do with their payroll that is steadily approaching the size of our national debt.

There are other factors as well. Owner George Steinbrenner, Roger Clemens and the arrogance of the Yankee faithful all make me want to throw up.



I applaud Matsui, however, for his graceful defeat. In a statement released by the team, Matsui is quoted as saying "I guess I just looked too old for a rookie. I think (Berroa) deserves to win."

In retrospect, he was too old to be considered a rookie. While some baseball analysts claim that Japanese baseball is comparable to the minor leagues, it isn't.

Former Major League players go over there all the time, taking with them experience of professional competition. So many of those players, Matsui included, had comparable

Cats travel to Missouri for conference match

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After having the weekend off, K-State enters a week that potentially could make or break its status atop the Big 12 Conference.

It all begins at 7 tonight against Missouri in the Hearne Center, followed by a battle for Big 12 supremacy when the Cats play host to Nebraska on Saturday.

Coach Suzie Fritz said the off weekend couldn't have been scheduled better.

"The bye week came at a very good time for us in terms of being able to physically and mentally get some rest and take a little break from each other," Fritz said. "We were able to take two days off and still have two days to train going into Missouri. It really couldn't have come at a better time."

Trying not to look ahead to Saturday's match up against the Huskers, Fritz said the focus is on Missouri.

After being taken to five games in a 3-2 win on Oct. 8, Fritz noted Missouri isn't a team to be taken for granted.

"They're a very good opponent," Fritz said. "They serve very aggressively, they're a very nice ball control team, and they run an extremely fast offense."

That offense, Fritz said, gave the Cats difficulty in the two teams' last meeting.

"When they're in system, that's difficult to defend and posed us some challenges last time," she said. "Hopefully we're a better team than the first time we played them, and we're prepared enough to make some adjustments to where they hurt us."

Going into tonight's match, Fritz said she was particularly pleased with the play of senior Cari Jensen.

Jensen, she said, has shown improvement over the last month and a half.

"I've been really happy with how she's come along in terms of where she was at in August and September and where she's been in October and November," Fritz said. "I've been happy with, progressively, how much better she's been playing."

Not to discredit anyone, Fritz said her team's success has come as a whole.

"There's a lot of people playing well – we wouldn't have won as many matches as we could if it wasn't for that," she said.

The one thing Fritz knows her team cannot do this week is overlook the Tigers and focus on the match up against Nebraska.

But, she added, that shouldn't be a problem against a team of Missouri's caliber.

"I don't think its hard because Missouri is a very capable team and they took us to five games here in our house," Fritz said. "We're anticipating a significant challenge up there on Wednesday and we can't afford to look ahead."

The 6-foot-5 center from Clay Center, Kan. averaged 18.5 points and nine rebounds per game last season, leading K-State to a school-best 29-5 record. She is also the defending Big 12 Player of the Year and was a 2003 Associated Press All-American for her performance last season.

Connecticut's Diana Taurasi, Duke's Alana Beard, Penn State's Kelly Mazzantet and Stanford's Nicole Powell round out the five-player squad.

K-State's Kendra Wecker was among 13 other players receiving votes.

The K-State women's basketball team was polled as the No. 5 team in the nation, according to the Associated Press Top 25 released Tuesday.

Connecticut received all 47 first place votes, while Duke was picked second, Texas third and Tennessee fourth. Purdue, K-State's opponent Sunday in the State Farm Tipoff Classic, was chosen seventh.

The Wildcats were already polled fifth in the ESPN/USA Today Coaches Poll.

Winning in Lincoln on Cats' radar

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Streaks and records mean a lot to K-State this season.

Ell Roberson broke the all-time yardage mark, and Darren Sproles broke the career rushing record, among others.

But one streak is still looming over the Wildcats.

They haven't won in Lincoln in 35 years.

Despite that streak, players and coaches kept all talk on the game and its ramifications for this season – leaving history in the past.

"Obviously, there's such a drought," Coach Bill Snyder said. "But the bottom line, in all reality, it keeps you alive to be able to play for a division championship."

Wide receiver Antoine Polite agreed. While K-State hasn't won at Memorial Stadium since 1968, nothing matters but this season.

Purple Power Hour is 60 minutes of student-driven content dedicated to K-State sports. The show, filmed once a month, covers a variety of K-State athletics.

"The idea was to showcase sports that do not usually get coverage," said Bambi Landholm, who serves as executive producer and faculty adviser to student television productions at K-State. "To mix those in with the more popular sports."

Sean Purcell, senior in electronic journalism, is in charge of production for Purple Power Hour. He created the show while taking a video practicum class with Landholm last spring. Purcell came up with idea for the show because Manhattan did not have televised sports coverage.

"You never got to see the student-athletes on camera," Purcell said. "You read about them and you hear sound bytes on the radio, but you never get a sense of what these people are like off the basketball court or football field."

The show is almost entirely student-run.

National Organization for Women chapter reactivates

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan chapter of the National Organization for Women reactivated on Tuesday night.

Members didn't know why there was a hiatus.

Betty Banner, chapter chair, said organizations go through cycles, and the chapter hit its low when they lost involvement in the community.

"No one had ever approached me to join the NOW chapter. I don't know how long ago it was when they became inactive," she said.

The Manhattan chapter took a stance on issues the national organization suggested, called priority issues. On Tuesday, Mayor Mark Taussig's marriage proclamation, the recent partial-abortion law and Sen. Sam Brownback R-Kan., were discussed, among other issues.

The Manhattan chapter's goal is to make women in the community aware of issues that face them. At the meeting, the members discussed probable activities they could involve themselves with in the community.

Megan Challender, sophomore in pre-law and chapter member, said she looks forward to what the new chapter has to offer.

"Our first priority is letting the women in the community know about their rights. Their civil rights, their rights concerning reproduction, but it's even a lot more broad than that," she said.

Phoebe Samelson, member, said she was glad to see K-State students attend the meeting.

"It is good to know that there are women from the university that wish to become involved with this organization," she said.

Samelson attributes the reactivation of the chapter to Banner.

"Betty has really been the spear head for this reactivation. She went to a conference to find out what we had to do, and is going to another conference this weekend," she said.

Banner said she organized the group to keep the rights that women have today strong.

"Many young women don't realize what life was like when we were young. We will lose the opportunity to keep what we already have if we don't stand up and advocate for the issues that face women," she said.

"We don't want to lose the rights we now have as women."

Fear of Saddam's return prevents U.S. from receiving intelligence

By Hamza Hendawi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq– America's top soldier in Iraq said Tuesday a "blanket of fear" that Saddam Hussein will return prevents Iraqis from giving U.S. troops intelligence vital to curb the growing insurgency – stepped up attacks underlined by a late night barrage on the heart of Baghdad.

The top U.S. administrator in Iraq abruptly departed for Washington, amid growing frustration over the inability to halt the attacks on U.S. soldiers and the slow process of turning power over to the Iraqis.

Late Tuesday, insurgents fired mortars toward the U.S. headquarters compound, known as the "Green Zone," in Baghdad. The Coalition Provisional Authority said there was no damage to coalition headquarters, located in the Republican Palace. After one detonation, white smoke could be seen rising from an area just north of the palace.

Despite the mounting violence, Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez angrily dismissed comparisons between Iraq and Vietnam and said his soldiers will try to balance between the use of massive firepower and the need to win the goodwill of Iraqis. Attacks on coalition forces, he said, now average 30 to 35 a day, twice the number two months ago.

"On the near term, given the focus we have on our offensive operations, and given the level of engagements that the enemy has chosen to move to ... we are going to have more attacks here in the next 30 to 60 days," Sanchez told reporters.

L. Paul Bremer, the chief civilian administrator for Iraq, returned to Washington at a time of increasing tension between coalition officials and the U.S.-appointed Iraqi leadership, the Governing Council. Bremer wants to delay transferring sovereignty until the Iraqis draft a constitution and hold national elections.

As Bremer held meetings at the White House on Tuesday, a Bush administration official acknowledged concerns about the council's progress since its installation four months ago. But he rejected suggestions the administration was about to put the council out of business.

The official, who insisted on anonymity, noted a U.N. Security Council resolution sets a Dec. 15 deadline for the council to arrange for the drafting of a constitution.

The Iraqis have yet to agree on how to choose delegates to draw up a constitution. Some coalition officials suspect the Iraqis are stalling in hopes Bremer will quickly give them more power.

Some Iraqi council members are also pushing for an Iraqi-controlled paramilitary force to fight the insurgents, something Bremer opposes without coalition oversight and control.

Coalition sources said Bremer is increasingly frustrated by some members of the Governing Council.

U.S. soldiers have been killed on average of one every 36 hours since President Bush declared an end to major combat operations on May 1.

Sanchez said insurgents have changed tactics to inflict more damage and casualties on American troops while reducing their own.

"I think we have got to be realistic," he said when asked if the insurgency was worsening. "The enemy has evolved its tactics. They use mortars and rockets so as not to engage our forces."

New coalition operation reports fire fights, casualties in tough terrain of Afghanistan

By Jonathan Fowler
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KABUL, Afghanistan– American and Afghan ground forces backed by helicopter gunships fought two groups of insurgents, killing one person in the first clashes of an anti-terrorism operation in the snowy mountains of eastern Afghanistan, the U.S. military said Tuesday. No coalition troops were hurt.

Far to the south, a car bomb damaged two U.N. offices, injuring two people, and a top policeman blamed al-Qaeda and Taliban, which have stepped up attacks against the limited authority of Afghanistan's central government two years after the hard-liners were driven from power by a U.S.-led coalition.

U.S. military spokesman Col. Rodney Davis said the soldiers from the 10th Mountain Division's "Warrior Brigade" were using Operation Mountain Resolve to hunt for anti-coalition forces in rugged Nuristan province, where the fighting is taking place around 13,000 feet above sea level.

"It is the most dangerous terrain we have operated in since we've been in Afghanistan," Davis said.

The anti-terrorism operation was launched Friday in Nuristan and neighboring Kunar province. It apparently targets elements of a network of insurgents, including al-Qaeda, the Taliban and forces loyal to renegade warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, a former prime minister who has called for a jihad, or holy war, against foreign troops in Afghanistan.

The Arab satellite television station Al-Arabiya on Tuesday broadcast what it said was footage of a Taliban attack on a U.S. patrol in Afghanistan.

The grainy and shaky footage, taken from a hill, showed a Humvee with an American flag on it driving on a narrow road in a mountainous desert landscape.

Guerrillas are then seen firing with AK-47s and rockets, and one blast hits after the American vehicle passes. It then showed military helicopters flying over the scene.

There was no way to independently confirm the footage.

Al-Arabiya reported that the source that gave it the film said the fighting happened in the first 10 days of the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, which began in late October. The source claimed that nine Americans were killed in the exchange. The footage showed no bodies. U.S. officials have not reported any such battle or American deaths.

On Tuesday, a statement purportedly from Mullah Mohammed Omar, the supreme leader of the Taliban, urged Muslims around the world to stop being "cowards" by failing to join the jihads, or holy wars, that he and others have called against the "infidel crusading forces."

"Get up, for God's sake, and fight for Islam," the statement said, calling on Muslims to be courageous, not only in Afghanistan and Iraq, but also in Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Iran. Omar, who has eluded capture by U.S. forces, said he will remain a leader of the Islamic movement and help create "an Islamic system until I am martyred."

The statement was faxed to The Associated Press in Peshawar, a city in northwestern Pakistan that borders Afghanistan. Mansoor Afghani, a Taliban official, said by telephone the statement was authentic.

Hale preserves Kansans' memories, accounts of 'A Day in My Community'

Participants record Kansas life for future generations

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nearly 5,000 Kansans woke up on Oct. 11, 2001 and wrote about their day.

The project was called "A Day in My Community ," and it was sponsored by the Kansas Association for Family and Community Education.

The letters that were completed over two years ago have finally finished the archiving process in the K-State archives.

People from 76 counties in Kansas participated in this event so that they may preserve and record a day in Kansas life.

There were nearly 5,000 letters submitted with over 10,000 pages of history, Dorothy Kroh, KAFCE "Day in My Community" committee chair, said. The letters ranged from one page to 57 pages, and the participants ranged from age six to people in their 90's.

Kroh said participants were asked to write about one day in their life. Some wrote about the things they did that day and others wrote about their previous life experiences.

"We decided on one day because people wouldn't want to write about their whole life," she said. "The project is a remembrance for generations to come."

Anthony Crawford, University Archivist, said the letters will describe what life was like to future generations.

"The idea was to record what life was like in Kansas so people in the future can look at what it was like to live in Kansas," he said.

Crawford said the letters were put in archival folders and then boxes to preserve them. He said this will be saved for the history collection.

KAFCE archived the letters at K-State because they have previous experience working with K-State, Crawford said.

"They have a close relationship with them so it was natural," he said.

Uteva Powers, K-State alumnus, said she found out about the project through the Grain Valley extension unit.

Powers said the project appealed to her because it was a record that would be preserved.

"I thought it was a very worthwhile project," she said.

Powers said she chose to focus mostly on the community when she was writing her letter because she thought future generations would find it interesting.

"I focused on the community and my life here in the community from the time I moved here," she said. "I'm glad I did it that way."

Cross-dressing millionaire found innocent of murder

By Juan A. Loanzo
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GALVESTON, Texas – Eccentric New York millionaire Robert Durst, who said he accidentally killed a hot-tempered neighbor in self-defense and then dismembered the body in a panic, was found innocent Tuesday of murder.

Jurors deliberated over five days, following nearly six weeks of testimony, before deciding that the real-estate heir did not murder 71 year-old Morris Black, who lived across the hall from him in a low-rent apartment building.

Durst, 60, who is under suspicion in two other killings and who posed for a time as a mute woman, testified in his own defense for nearly four days. He insisted that Black was shot accidentally during a struggle over a gun, and said he used two saws and an ax to cut up the body. The victim's head has never been found.

Durst appeared stunned when he heard the verdict from state District Judge Susan Criss, standing with his mouth slightly open and his eyes filling with tears. He hugged his attorneys afterward, saying "Thank you so much."

After the killing in late September 2001, Durst was a fugitive for six weeks until he was caught in Pennsylvania when he tried to shoplift a $5 sandwich even though he had $500 in his pocket.

At the agreement of defense lawyers and prosecutors, jurors considered only a murder charge, not lesser charges in addition such as manslaughter.

If he had been convicted, Durst could have been sentenced to five to 99 years in prison and been fined up to $10,000.

He still faces a bail-jumping count for fleeing following his murder charge, and that could carry a sentence of two to 10 years if he is convicted.

Prosecutor Kurt Sistrunk said he was dismayed and disappointed with the jury's decision but retained his confidence in the jury system.

Pat Sullivan | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
Multi-millionaire murder defendant Robert Durst, right, hugs defense team member Pat Benken after a not guilty verdict Tuesday in Galveston, Texas. The cross-dressing son of a New York City real estate tycoon was accused of murder for killing a neighbor, then dismembering the victim.

Motive was not something they had to prove, prosecutors said, arguing all of Durst's actions were unexplainable and that Durst was a habitual liar who couldn't be trusted.

Prosecutors called Durst a calculating, cold-blooded killer who shot Black to steal his identity. They said all his actions afterward, including cutting up the body and twice fleeing Galveston, Texas, were part of an elaborate plan to hide his guilt.

But defense attorneys contended Black was shot accidentally while the two men struggled for a gun after Durst found his neighbor illegally in his apartment. The defense said prosecutors failed to show jurors any motive for the killing or disprove self-defense.

"Whatever (Durst) did after Morris Black was dead cannot change how Morris Black died," defense attorney Dick DeGuerin said in his closing statement. "You can't convict Bob Durst simply because of that."

After the verdict was read, DeGuerin praised jurors for "their ability to look at this case for what the charge was."

Juror Chris Lovell said he changed his mind several times before making a final decision.

"From the very beginning of this trial, the defense told us a story and they stuck to their guns all the way through," he said. "I did not believe everything they said, but every time they told us a story they were consistent in what was said."

Another juror, Deborah Warren, said the panel made a great effort to figure out what happened before Black died, based on the evidence they were given.

"There were people that cried, there were people that fussed and argued. ... My stomach is still knotted up," she said.

Sistrunk said Durst cut up Black's body without hesitation, meticulously cleaned the crime scene, reserved a flight to leave the area and dumped the body but later returned to retrieve the head because it could identify his victim.

"Is it well planned and calculated? You bet it is," Sistrunk said.

Durst moved to Galveston disguised as a woman to escape scrutiny in New York after an investigation was reopened into the 1982 disappearance of his first wife, Kathleen. He also was wanted for questioning in the 2000 shooting death of a friend, writer Susan Berman, who was set to be questioned about his missing wife.

He met Black while wearing his female disguise but later dropped the masquerade and they became friends.

Durst's attorneys said the friendship soured because of the elderly man's increasingly aggressive behavior. Durst and other witnesses testified Black often got into fights and arguments.

Neighbors "could hear Morris Black two blocks down the road when he was in his rages," witness Debra Monogan testified.

Durst testified that he found Black in his apartment on Sept. 28, 2001, and that Black armed himself with a gun Durst had hidden. During a struggle, the weapon fired, hitting Black in the face, he said.

Governor honors fallen soldiers at Veterans Day celebration

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – After she honored soldiers who died in Iraq, Gov. Kathleen Sebelius said Tuesday that Americans are concerned about how long the United States will remain engaged there.

Sebelius
KANSAS GOVERNOR

"I think there's a real worry about how many places we can have Americans," Sebelius told reporters. "We have troops in Bosnia. We have troops in Afghanistan. We have a lot of troops in Iraq. They want more troops in Iraq, and how we're going to be able to sustain that level for an indefinite period of time, I think, is a huge concern."

The governor made her remarks following a half-hour Veterans Day ceremony on the Statehouse grounds. About 100 people attended the event, during which Sebelius placed a wreath in front of the Veterans Memorial on the south side of the Capitol and read the names of soldiers from Kansas or stationed in Kansas who died in Iraq.

Later, referring to Iraq, Sebelius said Americans have questions about "how we're going to secure a peace and get our men and women out of there safe and sound."

She added: "Is the price of freedom worth it? Certainly, but how we extricate ourselves from some of these situations without losing too many more young lives, I think, is very difficult."

During the ceremony, Sebelius presented folded American flags to the families of two Kansans who died, Spc. Kyle G. Thomas, of Topeka, and Pfc. Ryan R. Cox, of Derby. She also honored two others, Spc. Dustin K. McGaugh, of Derby, and Sgt. Jacob Wells, of Wellsville.

In addition, she read the names of 13 other soldiers from other states and territories who were stationed in Kansas before their service in Iraq.

Audience, contestants enjoy K-State talent show

When Trista Stone took the stage during the K-State Idol contest, she wasn't singing for herself or the audience, but for her dad.

"I was hesitant at first. My dad really pushed me to do this," Stone, junior in fine arts, said. "We just found out my dad has cancer. I came out and did this for him."

Stone left Forum Hall as the overall winner of K-State Idol.

Stone performed two songs, "The Night is Young" and "Nobody Does it Better."

"It really surprised me because I didn't think I was going to win," Stone said. "I really don't do a whole lot of contests and stuff. I just came out here to have fun."

Stone was one of 11 students who competed.

K-State Idol parucipants competed in one of three categories: vocal, variety or vocal with accompaniment.

In addition to the overall winner, a first and a second place winner was awarded in each category.

Devin Henderson, senior in family studies and human services, won first place in the variety category.

During his performance, Henderson pulled judge Laura Buessing, sophomore in food nutrition-exercise science, on stage and incorporated her into his magic act.

"She just made it fun," Henderson said. "She did a really good job – she's magic."

He also said he was impressed with the other acts with whom he competed.

"I think the other acts were great," he said. "There was some great talent. It was fun and entertaining."

Henderson's magic act consisted of a variety of card tricks – making them disappear and reappear – and levitating a piece of paper.

The audience clapped and cheered as he seemingly pulled cards out of his mouth.

During his act, he had music playing in the background.

"Magic fools the eyes and teases the mind, but music touches the soul," he said in between tricks.

Before allowing Buessing to return to her seat, Henderson ignited the paper he was levitating and produced a rose from it, which he gave to Buessing.

Joshua Lewis, senior in accounting, said he went to support his fraternity brother and Daniel Munden, senior in agronomy.

Munden won first place in the vocal with accompaniment category.

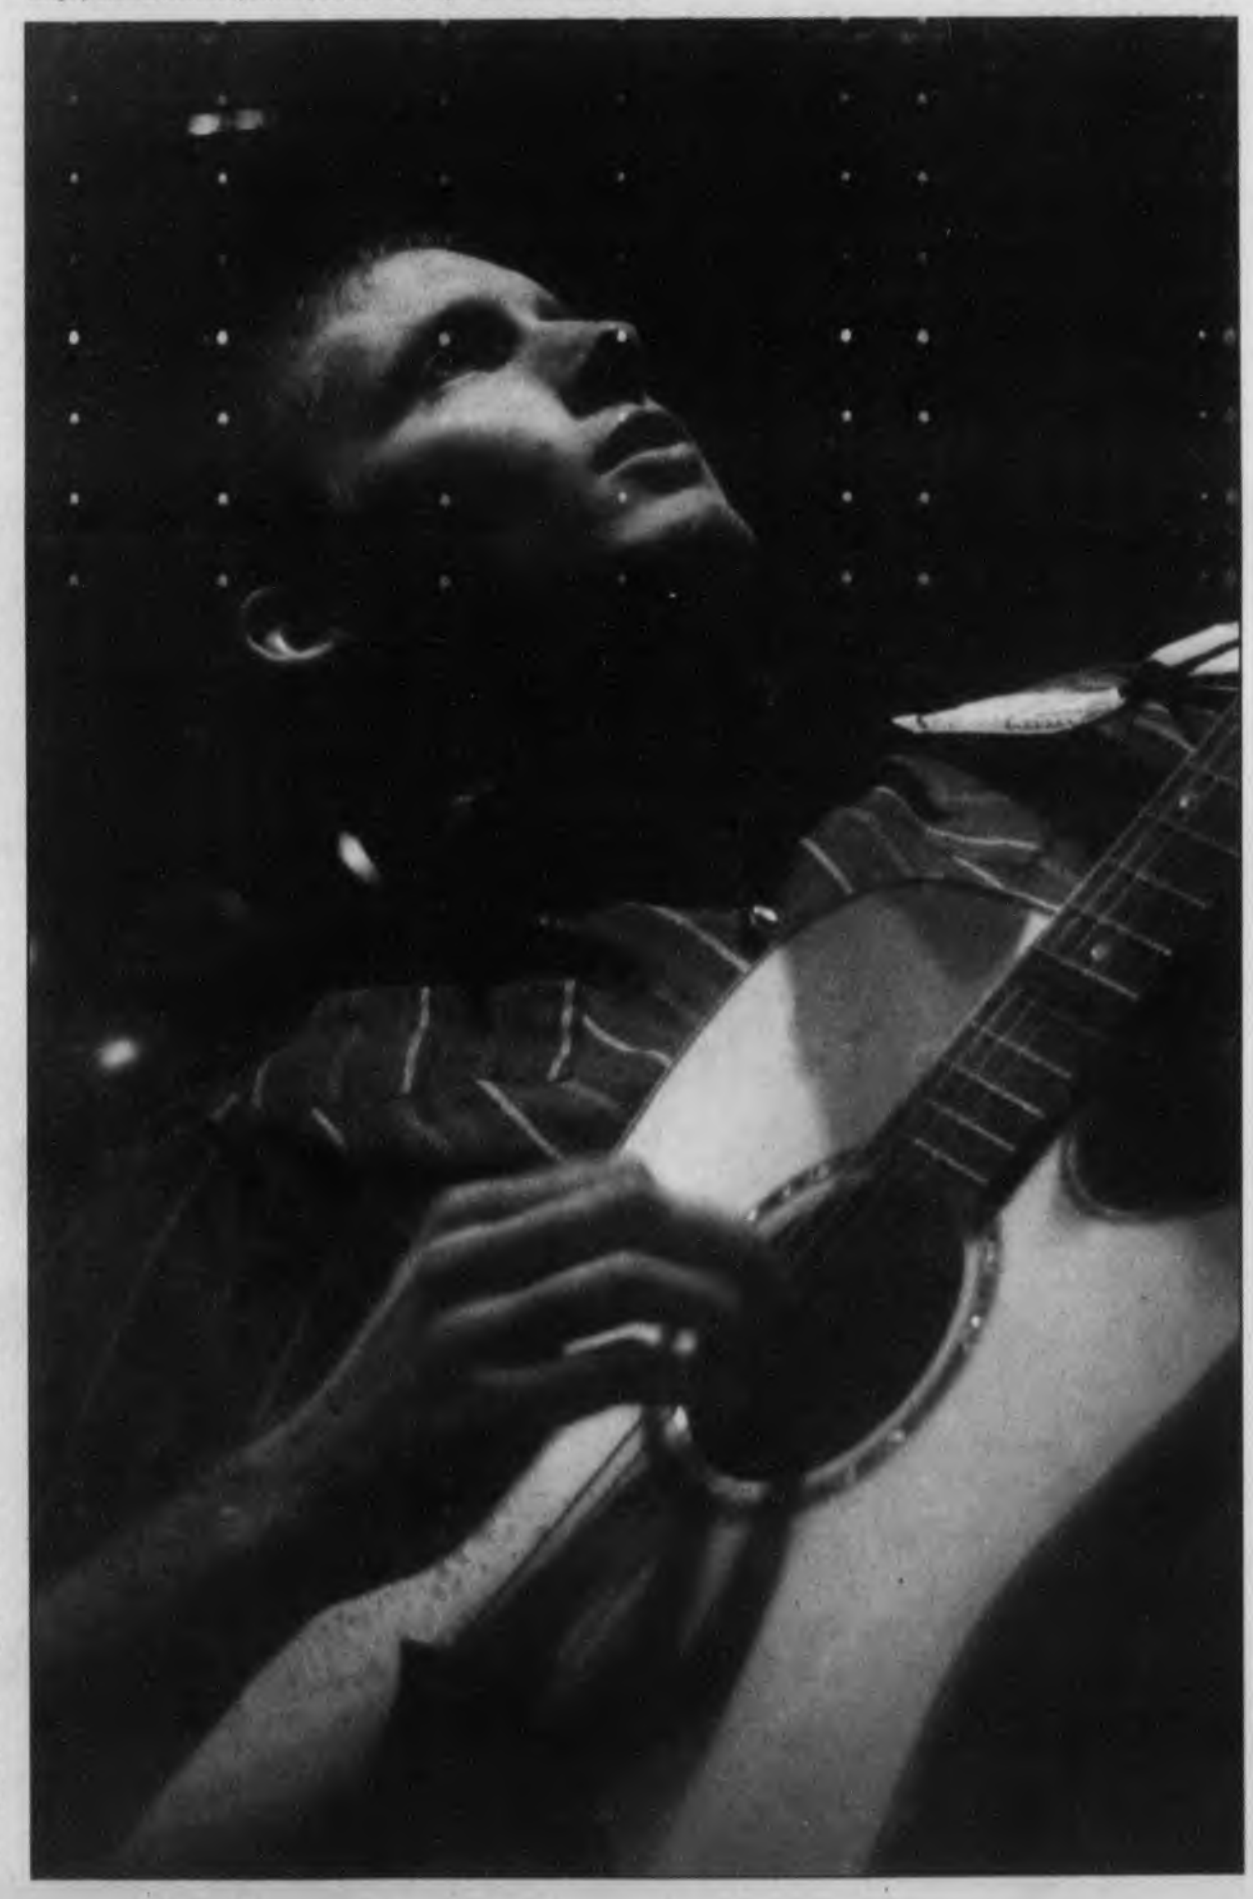
"He did an excellent job," Lewis said.

The acts on stage were only part of the K-State Idol event.

People who either donated money at the door or brought a canned food item were entered in a raffle for prizes. Winners of the raffle were drawn and announced after the second, sixth and ninth acts.

The audience filled more than three-quarters of Forum Hall.

"I thought it went really well. I hope they do it again next year," Matt Hunt, senior in agricultural economic and host of K-State Idol, said.



"I hope they find another emcee to do it, but I hope they do it again next year."

Actor Art Carney dies

Art Carney, who played Jackie Gleason's sewer worker pal Ed Norton in the TV classic "The Honeymooners" and went on to win the 1974 Oscar for best actor in "Harry and Tonto," has died at 85.

Carney died in Chester, Conn., on Sunday. He had been ill for some time.

The comic actor would be forever identified as Norton, Ralph Kramden's bowling buddy and not-too-bright upstairs neighbor on "The Honeymooners." The characters appeared in various forms from 1951 to 1956, and the show was revived briefly in 1971. The shows can still be seen on cable.

Bremer called to discuss Iraq council complaints with White House officials

Bush urges U.S. to be patient in face of casulties

By Terence Hunt
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Frustrated with the U.S.-picked Iraqi Governing Council, President Bush's national security advisers questioned the top American administrator in Iraq on Tuesday about how to break a political logjam in Baghdad and speed planning for the nation's political future.

Bremer
PRESIDENTIAL ENVOY TO IRAQ

L. Paul Bremer was summoned unexpectedly from Baghdad to a White House meeting with Secretary of State Colin Powell, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice and other key officials.

There have been concerns about the performance of the governing council, a senior administration official said, particularly the lack of progress toward a Dec. 15 deadline to set a timetable for writing a new constitution and holding democratic elections.

Bush, meanwhile, urged Americans to be patient in the face of rising casualties and growing criticism that the United States lacks a strategy for postwar Iraq.

"After decades of a dictator's sustained assault on Iraq's society and dignity and spirit, a Jeffersonian democracy will not spring up in a matter of months," the president said in a Veterans Day speech to the conservative Heritage Foundation.

"The work we are in is not easy, yet it is essential," Bush said. "The failure of democracy in Afghanistan and Iraq will condemn every advocate of freedom in those two countries to prison or death, and would extinguish the democratic hopes of millions in the Middle East."

Bremer's hurried flight to Washington caught his staff by surprise and forced him to cancel a planned meeting with Poland's prime minister, Leszek Miller. Some U.S. officials believe that key members of the 25-member Iraqi council are stalling in hopes of winning concessions from American leaders under political pressure to turn over power to the Iraqis.

Administration officials expressed disappointment in the council's work but said Bush was not about to disband it.

"Increasingly the Iraqi people are assuming the responsibilities and the risks of protecting their own country. And their willingness to accept these duties is one of the surest signs that the Iraqis want freedom and that the Iraqis are headed toward self-government."

George W. Bush
U.S. PRESIDENT

"The notion that we are about to throw the council to the wolves is exaggerated," a senior administration official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "But there is a need to put some energy into the political transition. It is true they are not as together as we had hoped."

The official, who is familiar with Iraq policy, said he expects Bush to stick with the basic outlines of his policy to achieve a transition to Iraqi authority.

The White House talks, like Bremer's return to Washington a few weeks earlier, were part of a process to energize and accelerate political, military and especially security arrangements in Iraq, officials said.

"The long-term security of Iraq will be assured by the Iraqis themselves," Bush said.

He said 118,000 Iraqis were serving as police officers and in other security positions, and 35,000 Iraqi troops would be in the field by the end of next year.

"Increasingly the Iraqi people are assuming the responsibilities and the risks of protecting their own country," the president said. "And their willingness to accept these duties is one of the surest signs that the Iraqis want freedom and that the Iraqis are headed toward self-government.

"Under our strategy," Bush said, "increasing authority is being transferred to the Iraqi people. "The Iraqi Government Council has appointed ministers who are responsible for the day-to-day operations of the Iraqi government."

Bremer did not mention his travel plans when he met Sunday with a congressional delegation in Iraq, said the head of the group, Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz.

Lynch disturbed by dramatized military reports, false stories

By Erin McClam
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK – Pfc. Jessica Lynch said Tuesday she is disturbed that the military seemed to overdramatize her rescue by U.S. troops and spread false stories that she went down shooting in an Iraqi ambush.

"That wasn't me. I wasn't about to take credit for something I didn't do," she told The Associated Press. "I'm not that person."

Lynch
FORMER POW

The 20-year-old former Army supply clerk – twig-thin and weary, one crutch close at hand – described her ordeal in a Veterans Day interview seven months after the rescue made her a national hero.

Reports circulated by the U.S. military early in the war said Lynch waged a fierce gunbattle with Iraqi fighters who ambushed her 507th Maintenance Company on March 23 at Nasiriyah. She since has said her rifle jammed, and she did not get off a shot.

And video shot by the Americans who rescued her nine days later at an Iraqi hospital suggested they encountered resistance in a daring raid. Lynch's new book says hospital staff did not resist, and even offered U.S. troops a key.

"It disturbed me," Lynch said. "I knew that it wasn't the truth."

Still, the ex-prisoner of war from rural West Virginia took pains to say that she does not care why the military may have exaggerated her story, and that she considers the soldiers who rescued her April 1 to be heroes.

"No matter what it was, the point is that they got in there, they rescued me, and they took me home safe," she said.

Lynch, who has fair skin and fine blond hair that falls to her shoulders, physically recoils when she recounts her time in the hospital, a time when her hope dwindled each day that she would see home again – or even survive.

But she said that as she lay in a bed at Saddam Hussein General Hospital, her body wracked, she decided: "I wasn't going to let myself die there."

"I was determined," she said. "In my mind, I was thinking, 'I've got family to get back to, I've got a boyfriend, I've got all these things to see and do when I get home.'"

Lynch spoke with the AP as her biography, "I Am a Soldier, Too," hit bookstores nationwide. It was written by Rick Bragg, who resigned from The New York Times after a freelancer helped him with a story without receiving credit. Bragg was present during the AP interview with Lynch.

The book describes the Iraqi doctors and nurses who cared for her as thoughtful and gentle people who repeatedly and secretly tried to see her to freedom.

Lynch lost – or cannot remember – three hours between the ambush, when Iraqi troops swarmed her convoy after it missed a turn, and waking up in an Iraqi military hospital, according to the book.

In that time, according to medical records cited in the biography, Lynch suffered spinal fractures and other broken bones and was sodomized. Iraqi doctors have disputed the sexual assault allegations.

Today, Lynch walks with the help of a single crutch or is shuttled around in a wheelchair. She undergoes two hours of physical therapy a day. "It's getting better every day," she said. "It's a long process, but it's going OK."

Lynch said she tries to avoid news coverage of the fighting in Iraq because her memories are too painful.

She said the almost-daily reports of U.S. troop deaths deeply sadden her.

Teacher pleaded guilty to sexually assaulting boy

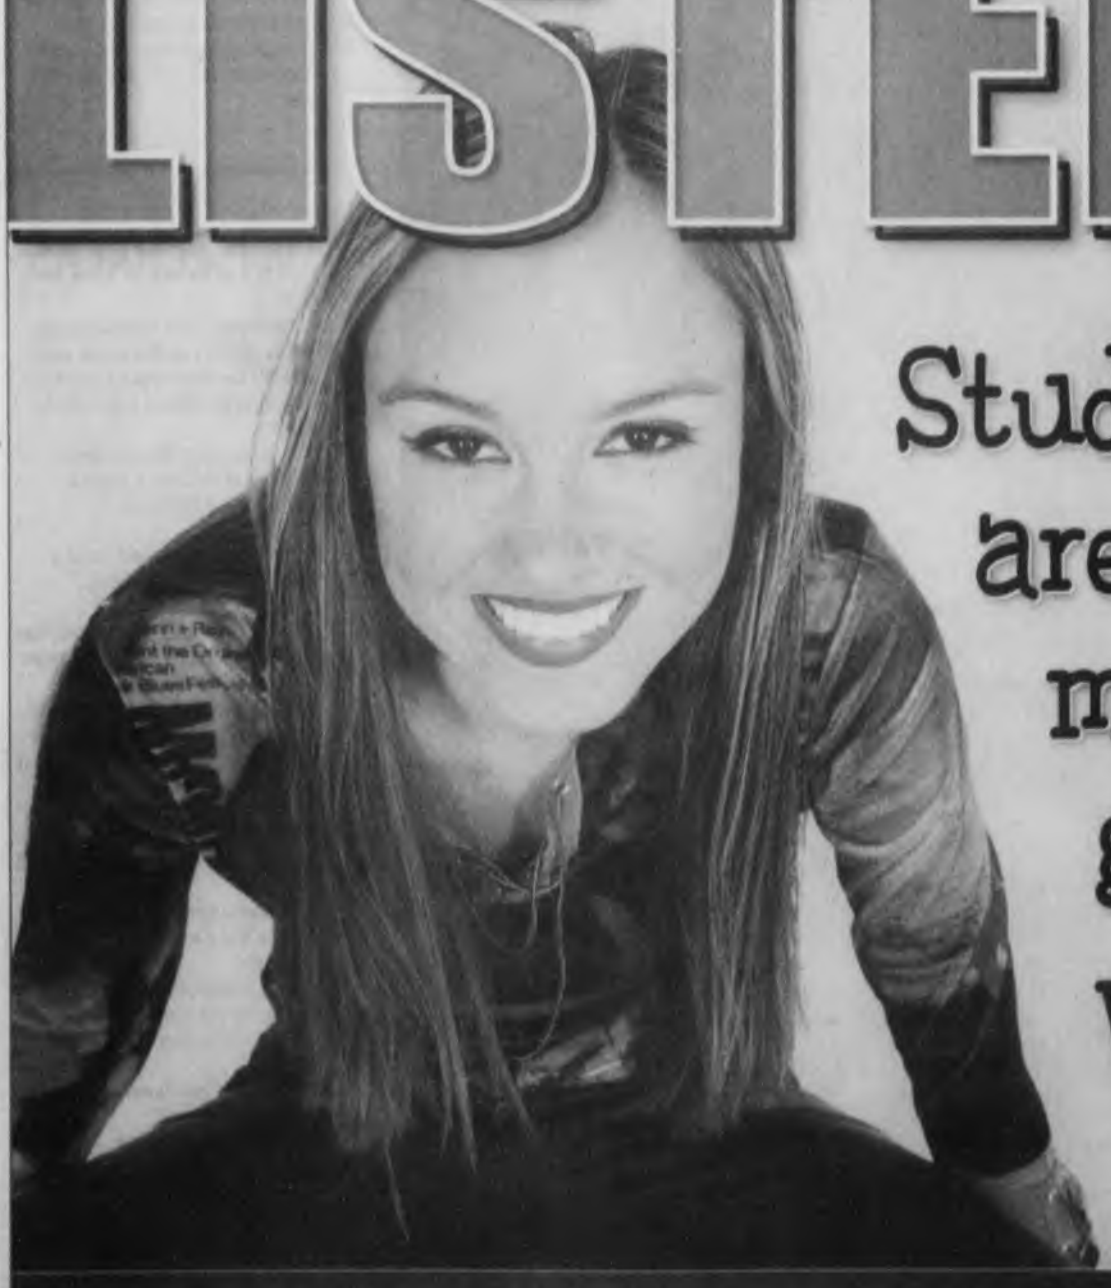
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. – A former music teacher has pleaded guilty to sexually assaulting a young boy.

Joseph E. Hamm, 49, of Kansas City, initially was charged with four counts of statutory sodomy and one count each of forcible sodomy, kidnapping, possession of child pornography, furnishing pornographic material to a minor, and sexual misconduct involving a child by indecent exposure.

Hamm pleaded guilty Monday in Jackson County Circuit Court to four counts of statutory sodomy and one count of sexual misconduct. The other charges were dismissed as part of a plea agreement.

The Center School District fired Hamm after the charges were filed in December. He had taught vocal music in the district's high school and middle school.



In 1996 Hamm resigned a teaching position in Coralville, Iowa, after he was charged with misdemeanor sexual harassment involving a 14-year-old female student.

He entered an Alford plea, in which he did not admit wrongdoing but acknowledged that prosecutors had enough evidence to convict him.

Hamm was able to have his Iowa criminal record expunged, making it unlikely that the record would have appeared on background checks.

Sentencing is scheduled for Jan. 5.

major league experience.

But even though Matsui accepted his defeat in stride, Steinbrenner released his typical arrogant statement.

"As far as I'm concerned, the person who plays left field for the Yankees was the Rookie of the Year," Steinbrenner said.

"All year round, New Yorkers cheered him, and he gave great inspiration to our fans."

Apparently, if Georgie-boy had his way, the fact that New Yorkers cheer for someone makes them more qualified for accolades than their performance on the field.

He still probably doesn't realize his Yankees lost the World Series.

But all that matters is that Berroa won.

He showed great class all year, going from an error-prone shortstop being booed by his own fans to running off a 49-game errorless streak.

Maybe Steinbrenner and Co. can come out of this by learning a valuable life lesson, something more important than buying World Series rings.

things now that he's trying to master and doesn't quite have yet," Snyder said.

THE GHOST OF QB'S PAST

Ell Roberson isn't Michael Bishop, although similarities have arisen this year between the quarterback in 1998 and this season.

What it comes down to, Snyder said, is intensity.

"Michael never really got to the point where he didn't think he had to make every play in the ball game," Snyder said. "Ell's a tough competitor, but it doesn't always show like it did for Michael."

Both players were record-setters, though.

Roberson has already broken the career total-offense mark, at which Bishop ranks third, and the career rushing touchdown mark, where Bishop ranks sixth.

"Michael Bishop was a competitive, competitive young guy and he played the game to win every snap. I love him dearly for that," Snyder said, "but Ell's very competitive by nature, too."

CHECKING OFF

A sellout crowd of more than 73,000 is expected Saturday in Lincoln, meaning K-State will have to adapt to the noise.

Tight end Thomas Hill said that begins at the line of scrimmage, where Ell Roberson will be charged with directing audibles.

Normally, Hill said K-State changes the play at the line on seven out of 10 downs. When the volume gets cranked up, that number plummets.

"Fans are always something," he said. "They have a great advantage up there."

and how to interview," Purcell said. "We like to get students involved and get them experience. In journalism, if you do not have experience, you are not going to get a job."

Last April, what is now the "Purple Power Hour" was filmed as a pilot called Wildcat Sports Insider.The show was originally 30 minutes, but increased to an hour because the show contained an entire month of programming.

The show has had immediate success. "Purple Power Hour" won first place among sports programs in the heartland region of the National Broadcasting Society production contest, which included schools from 10 Midwest states.

"The thought was to have a local K-State based sports show," Landholm said.

"Instead of focusing on the big sports, we mix in some of the lesser known sports and give them coverage.

"We've done stories on rowing, equestrian, men's and women's golf."

The Nov. 13 episode will feature similar variety.

"This week's show will have a football interview, a volleyball interview and an equestrian interview," Landholm said. "We will also introduce the men and women's basketball recruits."

"Purple Power Hour" is always looking for students to help with the show.

"For people who are interested in getting into broadcasting, this is a perfect opportunity to get involved," Purcell said.

STUDY ABROAD | Peer advisers, internships to help program

semester contracts which are beneficial for students who decide to study abroad.

Sara Jahansouz, president of the Panhellenic Council, said she doesn't think the increase in study-abroad students will affect the greek houses.

"We are very aware that study abroad is increasing," she said.

Jahansouz said sororities will not have problems because if someone who lives in the house decides to study abroad, a new member would be able to live in the house.

Kent Holland, director of International Programs, said he would like to see the number of K-State students studying overseas increase, and that he has several ideas to make that happen.

One of his ideas is to have professors take groups of students abroad.

Experienced peer advisers also have been added, to the Study Abroad Office, Holland said. The peer advisers go to classes and make presentations on studying abroad.

Increasing community service abroad is also a goal, Holland said. This involves sending students to third-world countries and having them work on community service projects.

Holland said the Study Abroad Office also is trying to find more internship possibilities for students to work abroad.

He said teaching English in Japan and China are examples.

Judge: same-sex lawsuit can proceed

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Thirty-four states have so-called "Defense of Marriage" laws, but Nebraska's ban is the only one that prohibits same-sex couples from enjoying many of the legal protections that heterosexual couples enjoy.

LINCOLN, Neb. – A federal judge has refused to dismiss a lawsuit challenging Nebraska's one-of-a-kind ban on same-sex marriages.

U.S. District Judge Joseph Bataillion on Monday refused a request by the state of Nebraska to dismiss the lawsuit, which was filed in April by the American Civil Liberties Union and other groups.

The lawsuit says the ban, which was approved by voters in 2000 and added to the Nebraska Constitution the next year, violates the rights of gay and lesbian couples.

Thirty-four states have so-called "Defense of Marriage" laws, but Nebraska's ban is the only one that prohibits same-sex couples from enjoying many of the legal protections that heterosexual couples enjoy.

The constitutional amendment, known as Initiative 416, passed with 70 percent of the vote.

It prevents homosexuals who work for the state or the University of Nebraska system from sharing health insurance and other benefits with their partners.

Lawyers for the state said the ACLU and the other groups did not have standing to challenge the lawsuit, since they could not show they were injured by it.

But Bataillion said the law would prevent such advocacy groups and gay and lesbian couples from lobbying to get the same benefits as other people.

The law "acts as a barrier to plaintiffs' participation in the political process, and thus as a result plaintiffs have established injury," he said.

ACLU lawyer Amy Miller hailed the decision, saying the ban "prohibits same-sex families from lobbying for even the most basic protections for their families through the normal democratic process."

Batallion also quoted Alexander Hamilton, who wrote about the dangers of passing legislation aimed at punishing a group of people.

"The dangerous consequences of this power are manifest. If the legislature can disenfranchise any number of citizens at pleasure by general descriptions, it may soon confine all the votes to a small number of partisans, and establish an aristocracy or oligarchy," he said.

The ACLU was joined in the lawsuit by Citizens for Equal Protection and Nebraska Advocates for Justice and Equality.

The ACLU's Lesbian and Gay Project and the New York-based Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund are underwriting the lawsuit.

Attorney General Jon Bruning did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Lambda attorney David Buckel called the law "the most extreme anti-gay family law in the entire nation."

The ban prevents same-sex couples from "securing protection against a wide array of injuries that domestic partnership laws and policies are designed to address, including being prevented from visiting a same-sex partner in the hospital, making care decisions when a same-sex partner is incapacitated, taking bereavement leave when a same-sex partner dies, or making funeral arrangements for a same-sex partner after death," the lawsuit says.

The ban was spearheaded by the Nebraska Coalition for the Protection of Marriage, which was co-chaired by former Republican Gov. Kay Orr.

Bishops cooperating with study of sex abuse

By Rachel Zoll
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – The leader of a watchdog panel appointed by U.S. Roman Catholic bishops said Tuesday she expects all dioceses to answer an unprecedented survey on clergy sex abuse that top church officials warn will produce results that "add to our own sorrow."

Anne Burke, an Illinois appellate judge who is acting chairwoman of the National Review Board, said about 80 percent of U.S. dioceses had responded by mid-September, a response rate she called remarkable for such a complex report.

The study will count the number of abuse cases since 1950 and calculate related costs for legal settlements with victims, therapy for victims and offenders and attorneys fees.

When the survey was announced, some bishops expressed concern that information might be used in civil lawsuits against the church and worried about confidentiality for priests included in the study. It was feared some bishops might not participate because of those concerns but Burke said she expects in the end all will participate.

Bishop Wilton Gregory, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, warned that release of the report on Feb. 27, during the Lenten season, will be "unpleasant and painful."

"It will certainly add to our own sorrow," and will "add some pain to an already painful moment in the history of the church," Gregory said.

Burke's progress report was made during the bishops' national meeting.

The 12-member panel is helping oversee several studies meant to find the extent of abuse in the church and the roots of the crisis that erupted in January 2002. A report on the causes of the scandal is scheduled to be released along with the statistical survey, which is being conducted by the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York.

Kansas BOE member recommends 'immersion' classes

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GARDEN CITY, Kan. – State Board of Education member Connie Morris said that school districts should voluntarily use total-immersion classes to teach English to students who don't speak it.

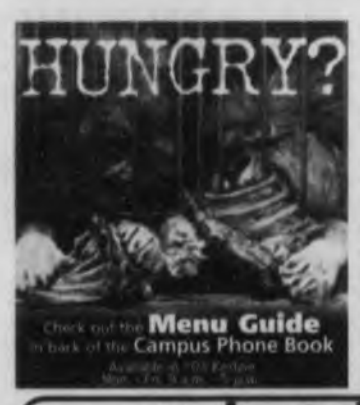
If the districts don't offer the classes voluntarily, the state would probably have to require them, Morris said Monday during a visit to Garden City.

During meeting with school officials, she suggested Spanish-speaking students should be taught English through immersion classes, which requires students to learn in English with little to no instruction in their native tongue.

"I would never say don't speak Spanish, but I think it's something you might want to think about," Morris told school officials. Studies prove the method's effectiveness, she said, and it is cheaper than other techniques.

Of the 7,670 students in the Garden City school district, nearly a quarter, most of them Spanish-speakers, receive special instruction such as bilingual or English as a Second Language classes.

James Lentz, superintendent of Garden City schools, told Morris he didn't think immersion methods were effective.

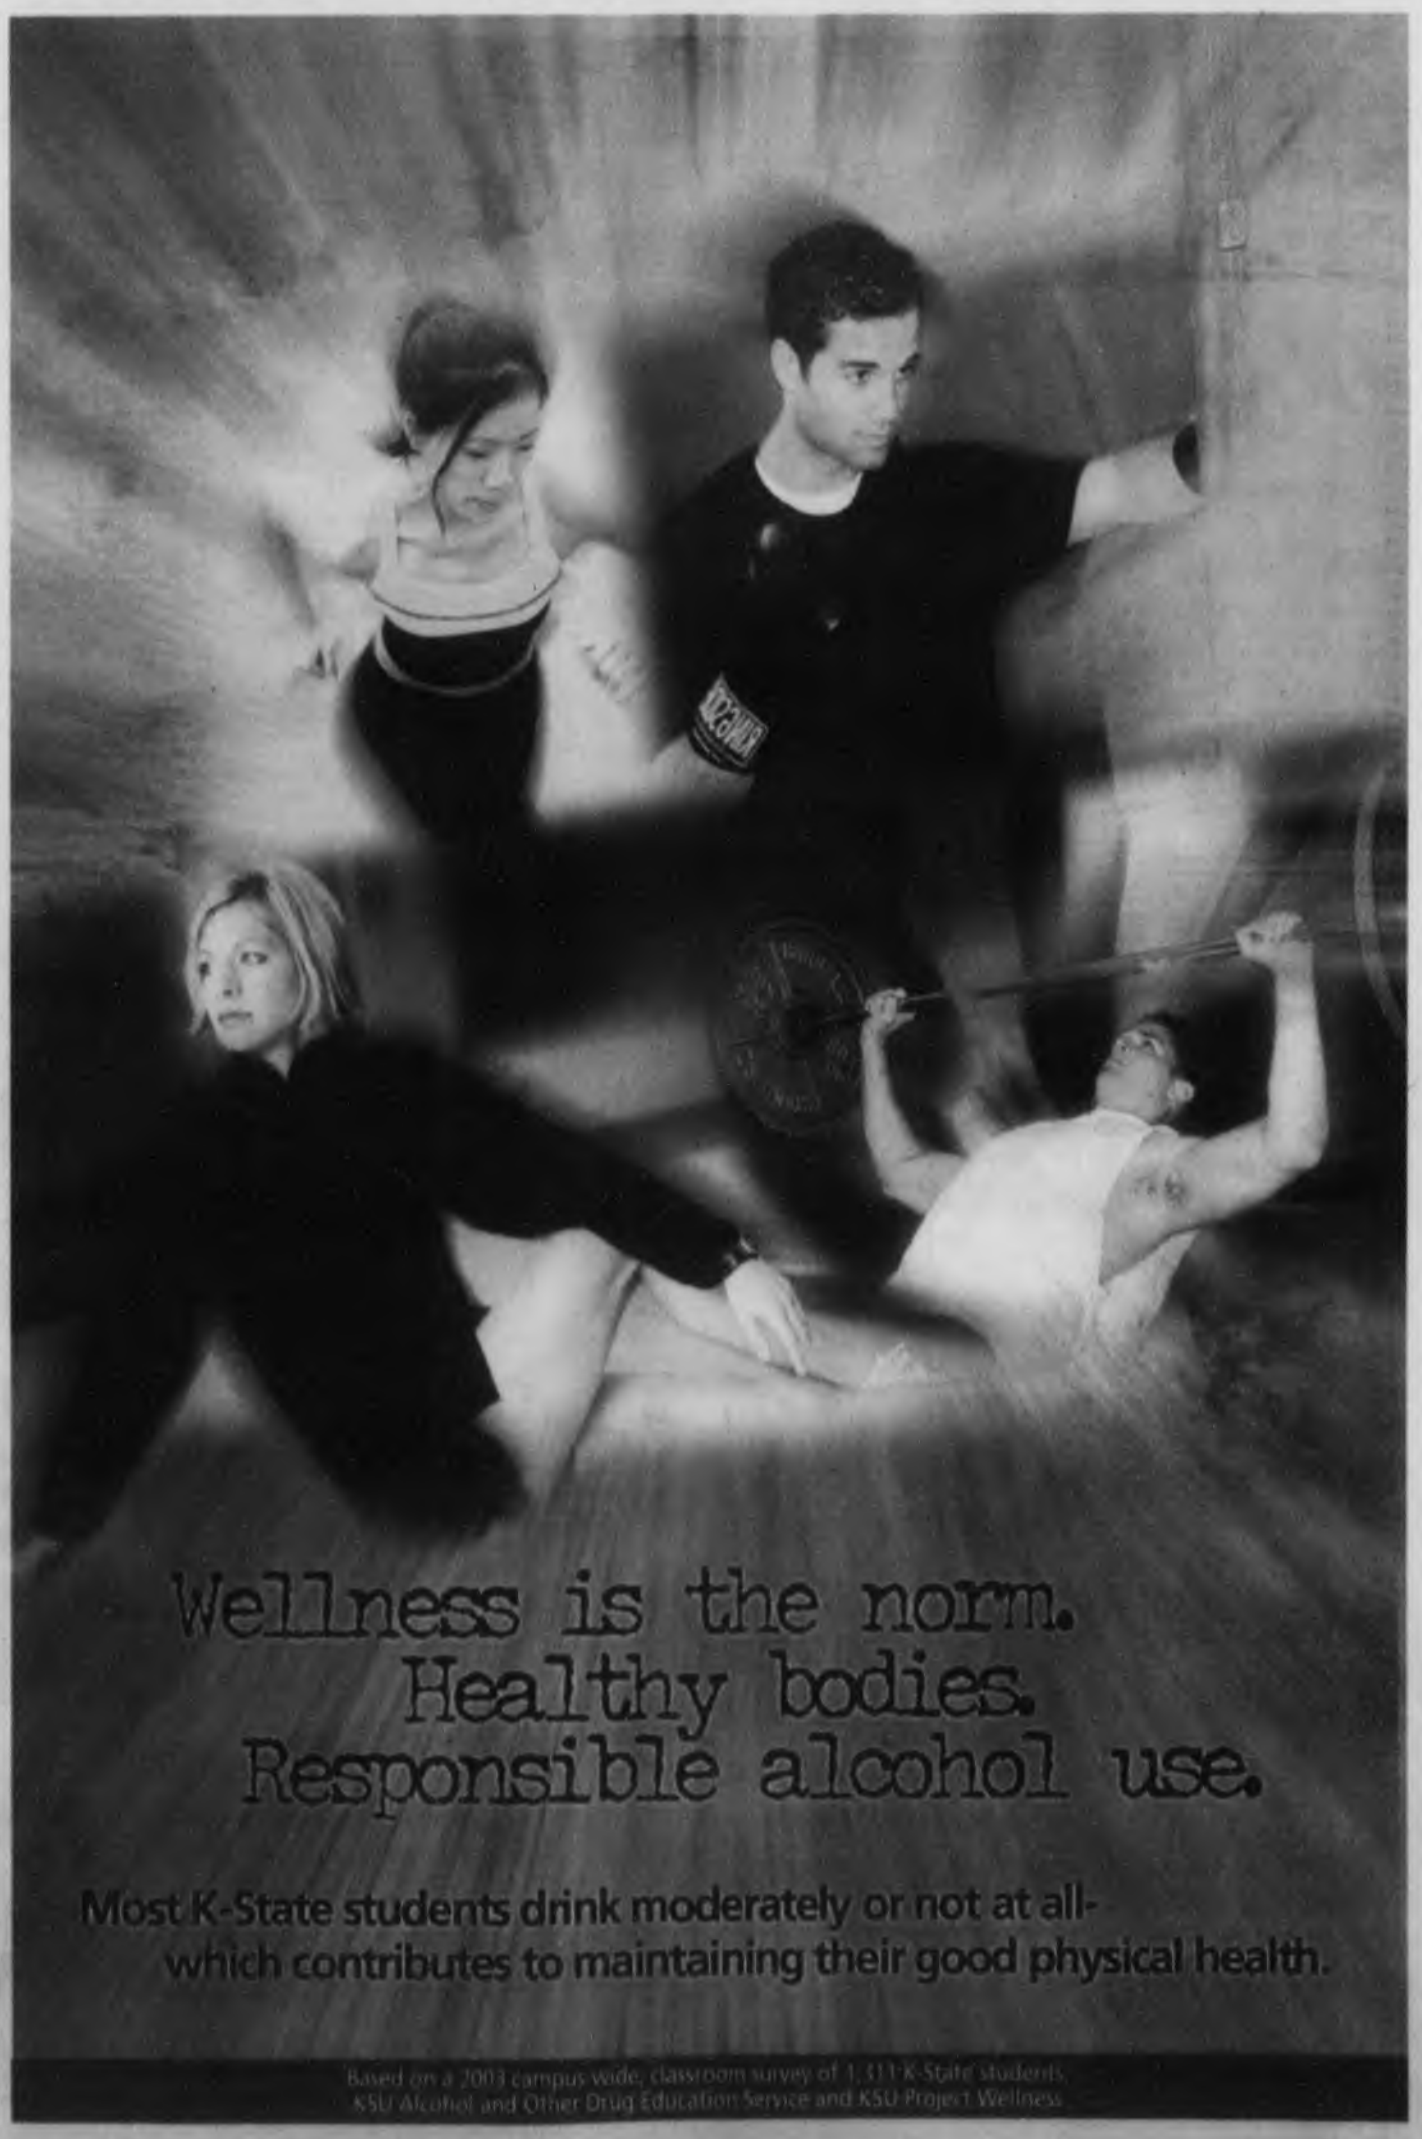


"I think that's a disservice to the kids," he said.

Morris was elected to the state board in November 2002, while criticizing rules that let illegal immigrants study in public schools as a drain on public funds. She also said that limited English-language instruction for non-English speakers ought to end after a year, with students placed in mainstream classes after that, regardless of their level of preparation.

"We're doing an extraordinary service, but we need to close the gate," Morris said Monday. She said her opinions resounded with many voters in the 2002 vote.

Kraig Dexter, interim principal at Garden City High School, said the school district studied various methods to teach students who don't speak English before choosing bilingual instruction, ESL classes and other techniques. Of the high school's 1,985 students, 200 receive ESL instruction.



"We really take the time to make sure the kids comprehend the language," he said. Using immersion techniques, he added, "kids don't do well."

A model student

Chad Raile, senior in kinesiology, laughs at his favorite TV show, "According to Jim," on Tuesday night. He and his roommate try to regularly catch the show. In addition to being a K-State student, he also is the underwear model for Ralph Lauren, the cover boy for Abercrombie and Fitch's 2001 Christmas catalog and is a regular on the pages of Cosmopolitan magazine.

Student requested by Abercrombie and Fitch photographer, becomes catalog cover boy

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He was the underwear model for Ralph Lauren, the cover boy for Abercrombie and Fitch's 2001 Christmas catalog and is a regular on the pages of Cosmopolitan magazine.

But all brawn and no brains doesn't apply to this K-State senior.

Chad Raile, despite his success in modeling, will graduate in May with a degree in kinesiology.

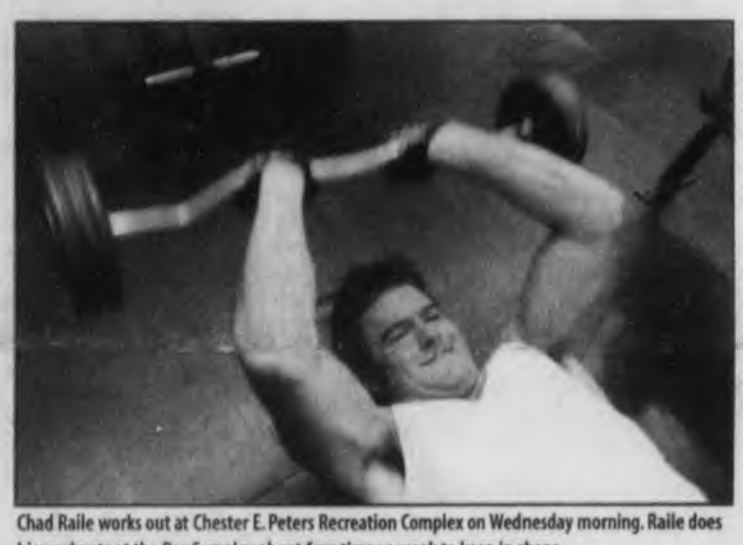
Raile's career began with an ad in the Collegian for a model search in the Kansas City area. He said he didn't expect much.

Suddenly, though, Raile, whose hometown of St. Francis, Kan., has a population of 1,200, was thrown into the world of big-city modeling. A Baltimore-based agency showed interest but with a few conditions.

"I was 200 lbs. and fairly healthy," Raile said. "They wanted me to cut back down to 175 and get tan. I thought I would give it a try."

After laying outside in the sun and regular workouts at the gym, Raile sent Polaroids of his new look to the agency and waited for a call.

In the meantime, the agency for Abercrombie and Fitch came to Baltimore, Raile said.



But by a strike of good luck, the Abercrombie photographer saw Raile's pictures lying on the agent's desk and asked to see a portfolio. There began Raile's career.

The photo shoot for Abercrombie's Christmas catalog was a weeklong job in Lake Placid, N.Y. Raile said he was nervous at first, but was able to quickly figure out what the photographers wanted.

"You don't just stand there and smile. You just relax and have fun," Raile said. "Most of the time they don't tell you how to move. If you're photogenic, you just kind of have it."

BB gun damages cars around Manhattan

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than a dozen automobile damage incidents were reported around the Manhattan area Tuesday after the suspected use of a BB gun, Riley County Police Department officials said.

RCPD Capt. John Doehling said not all of the vehicles have suspected BB gun shots; however, there is evidence on a majority of the vehicles.

There are no suspects.

A majority of the vehicles had damage done to the driver's side windows. Reports indicated the damage done was about $100 to $200 per vehicle.

The incidents, Doehling said, are similar to previous BB gun events that have occurred around Manhattan for about two years.

"It's a cyclical thing," Doehling said. "Somebody gets the bright idea to go out with a BB gun and shoot it."

In other news, about $4,000 worth of food was taken from Bob's Diner, 1103 N. Third St., between the months of April and November.

Officials said the incident is suspected internal theft, where employees of the diner were giving food to people without them paying for it.

Doehling said there are two suspects in the case.

Truck bomb strikes Italian base in attack against American ally

Alfredo Cunha | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

People run from the headquarters of Italy's paramilitary police after an explosion in Nasiriyah, southern Iraq on Wednesday. A truck bomb exploded at the headquarters, killing at least 14 Italians and possibly trapping others in the debris. The United States struck back at the Iraqi insurgency later Wednesday.

By Slobodan Lekic
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NASIRIYAH, Iraq – A suicide bomber blew up a truck packed with explosives at an Italian paramilitary base Wednesday, killing at least 26 people. The United States struck at the Iraqi insurgency hours later, destroying a warehouse in Baghdad and chasing attackers who were seen firing mortars.

The Nasiriyah attack was the deadliest against an American ally since the occupation began and appeared to send a message that international organizations are not safe anywhere in Iraq. It came on the same day the chief U.S. administrator for Iraq went to the White House to put forth proposals on transferring more authority to the Iraqis.

Col. Gianfranco Scalas said 18 Italians were killed: 12 Carabinieri paramilitary police, four soldiers, a civilian working at the base and a documentary filmmaker.

A spokesman for the U.S.-led coalition said at least eight Iraqis also died. The bomber – whose nationality was not known – also died.

The blast wounded 79 people, 20 of them Italians, hospital sources and Italian officials said.

Italians were stunned by their nation's single worst military loss since World War II and its first in the Iraq campaign.

HOW TO

Apply for financial aid

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The school year is past the halfway point, which means it is time again to apply for student financial aid and scholarships.

Tanya McGee, associate director of student financial assistance, said the applications must be completed each year for eligible students.

To apply for federal financial aid, such as pell grants, loans and college work study, visit www.fafsa.ed.gov prior to the August 2004 deadline. The priority deadline is March 1, 2004, but the applications can be submitted as early as Jan. 1, 2004.

"Students should make certain to meet the priority deadline to receive the largest amount of financial assistance. If they wait until the beginning of the fall semester, they may not get nearly as much money because we award to the early applicants first," McGee said.

To complete the federal financial aid application, students need K-State's school code – 001928.

For scholarship applications, the deadline in Feb. 1, 2004, and students must undergo a different application process than the federal aid. The application and student financial assistance information is located on the Web site at www.ksu.edu/sfa.

"On some of the scholarship applications, there are series of questions that university donors allow scholarships only to go to certain students," McGee said.

McGee said in addition to completing the application online, the opportunity to visit Fairchild Hall also is available for both federal and scholarship assistance.

Senate to meet in Salina

Both organizations hope to gain valuable information from exchange

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate will travel to Salina tonight for its weekly meeting.

This trip to K-State's Salina campus occurs each year, said Sarah Laib, sophomore in public relations and political science and arts and sciences senator.

"We do it so all of Salina can experience how Manhattan runs their senate," she said.

Laib said she thinks it will be a good experience for everyone involved.

"I think that student senate plays a vital role with KSU here in Manhattan and also in Salina," she said. "It is essential that we visit that campus and the constituents there."

Senators from the Manhattan campus also will tour the Salina campus and eat dinner with their senators.

Student Body President John O'Hara said he looks forward to touring the campus and meeting the students. He also said tonight's meeting is a great oppurtunity to share ideas and learn from each other.

"K-State-Salina is an important part of the K-State community, and we look forward to this oppurtunity to show them that we care about the issues that are important to them," he said.

O'Hara said he looks forward to meeting the people and touring the campus tonight.

Paul Homan, Student Senate Chair at K-State-Salina, said they were looking to get K-State Salina's name out there.

"We want people to know what goes on down here and what different majors we offer," he said.

He said he hopes Salina senators can learn from the Manhattan senators.

"We want to find out the differences between the two senates," Homan said. "We hope to find out how they could run more efficiently."

Homan said Manhattan-Salina Relations Director Doug Zerr comes to Manhattan almost every Thursday for Senate's meetings in the Union Big 12 Room. The Salina and Manhattan senators teleconference on a regular basis, he said.

"We're looking forward to getting them down here and showing off our campus," he said.

Downtown area plans revealed tonight

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The unveiling of possible renovations will take place at the master plan meeting tonight at City Hall.

The last meeting of the master plan committee consisted of a model of downtown Manhattan. Community members placed stickers on the model on objects that interested them.

Jason Hilgers, staff liaison to the steering committee and assistant to the city developer, said the results of the visual preference will be discussed.

"In addition, we may discuss alternative master plan concepts and things specific to the redevelopment," Hilgers said.

At the last meeting, opening a four-way intersection at Third Street and Leavenworth Street was discussed. Hilgers said that because the land is privately owned by Dillard's and Manhattan Town Center, the city cannot begin planning without renegotiating the contract.

"It'll be considered as one or more of the options to consider, but it is a complicated issue. The private landowners would have to OK it," Hilgers said.

Although this is only the second public meeting, Hilgers said the steering committee has met about five times.

Hilgers said the developers and design team will unveil a model that reflects what community members were interested in.

Dial Realty of Omaha, Neb., is providing the plan to consider.

The plan was started in late September, and Hilgers said it should be presented to the commissioners by February.

"A detailed scope of the redevelopment will be available to present by February, we hope. We plan about three more meetings to bring the public in," he said.

Paroled Arkansas rapist found guilty

By Dana Fields
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LIBERTY, Mo. – A paroled Arkansas rapist was convicted of first-degree murder Wednesday for suffocating a woman in her lover's apartment three years ago.

Wayne DuMond, 54, will receive a life sentence without parole for the slaying of Carol Sue Shields, a 39-year-old married mother. Her body had been left bound and nude on a bed in the apartment of a man with whom she had been having an affair.

DuMond was arrested in June 2001, several months after Shields' death, when material under the woman's fingernails was matched to his DNA, which was in a national database.

DuMond was paroled in Arkansas after serving 13 years of a sentence for the 1984 rape of a teenager. DuMond was awaiting trial in that case when someone castrated him in 1985 in his Arkansas home.

DuMond later married a Missouri woman who had visited him in prison and in August 2000 moved to a home about 10 miles from the apartment where Shields was killed two months later.

Until DuMond's arrest on the DNA match, three other men had been considered suspects in Shields' death: her husband; her boyfriend and the man's roommate.

DuMond's attorney, Anthony Cardarella, called the DNA evidence unreliable and insignificant and repeatedly suggested during the trial that Mark Shields knew of his wife's affair and had a shaky alibi.

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Creation of 4-way stop is best decision to ease mall traffic

At tonight's Downtown Redevelopment public meeting, city administrators and community members will be reviewing and discussing plans for the downtown area.

It was suggested two weeks ago at the first public meeting to create a four-way intersection at Third and Leavenworth streets.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Currently, Third Street is a three-way intersection, coming to a dead end at the Manhattan Town Center Mall.

This makes it difficult for customers to get in and out of the mall's parking lot.

At tonight's meeting, it is encouraged that citizens take a proactive approach to the decision making on this issue. To the redevelopment committee: a four-way stop will improve an already stressed traffic situation near the mall.

Opening up Third Street could connect the new businesses to the mall, creating one large shopping district.

This also would create easier access to the mall and allow traffic to flow better around the mall.

Speaking candidly and Franken-ly

Liberal humorist entertains conservatives with hypocritical humor

GRANT REICHERT

You know that little voice you have in your head? No, not the voice that says you'd be the hall hero if you pulled the fire alarm or that you can lose weight by eating at Subway.

I mean the voice that tells you not to do stupid things.

It says things like, "Don't eat somebody else's ramen noodles out of the communal hall sink" and "Don't assume girls are stupid just because they're blonde – brunettes can be just as dumb."

Don't hear that voice? Yeah, me neither, but if I did, last Friday it would've been screaming, "Don't go to Al Franken. Don't go to Al frickin' Franken!"

Still, I gave Al Franken a shot.

I didn't want to regret this the way I've always regretted turning down those noodles. Come on, they were in the sink – they had to be clean.

Franken was a comic machine, second only to the comic high achieved in the heydays of "Blossom." Let me give you a taste of Al's genius.

First, he said he liked Howard Dean as a presidential candidate. I nearly soiled myself.

He later said four or five of the Democratic hopefuls would make good presidents. I nearly snorted my spleen out my nose at this.

Then, when he said Bill Clinton was a good president, I nearly laughed my head off.

Predictions were gloomy, but God as my witness, I will live to crap again one day.

Franken also was a master of irony. He made fun of others' appearances, despite the fact he looks like the bastard love child of a deformed leprechaun and an Australopithecine caveman. I don't know whether he should endorse a cereal or be proclaimed the missing link.

In summary, Al Franken is an aesthetically-challenged humorist of the juvenile and vitriolic kind. That's right, he's my hero.

I, too, have a caveman brow that's been in the family for some time – about 40,000 years – and I also have the physique of a Popsicle that comes in only two flavors, "bitter" and "extremely bitter."

Franken's jokes are kind of like mine, too – only funny. I hope to someday become the juvenile wise guy he is. I had my wisdom teeth taken out a few months ago, which helped to reduce my wisdom, but I still have light-years to go.

The only problem with Franken? His politics were slightly left of Stalin. Franken bashed Bush mercilessly by holding him to a higher standard than the risen Lord. Unless Bush starts curing lepers with his divine touch pretty soon, he's going to continue to get bashed.

Franken accused Rush Limbaugh of making racist comments, but turned around and endorsed Dean, the candidate who most wants to represent the Confederate flag-waving, inbred constituency.

I don't want to go down that road, though. Pointing out hypocrisy on the left is like pointing out the jokes in my column that fall flatter than Calista Flockhart – it's too much pointing for one man's finger.

At least Franken admits he was a liar. Franken is standing prominently on the cover of his book, "Lies and the Lying Liars that Tell Them." It takes a great amount of honesty to call yourself a liar.

There was a scary aspect to attending Al Franken's show, though. I was surrounded by "compassionate" liberals who would've ripped out my beating heart and devoured it had they thought I might differ ideologically. I tried to blend in, but acting like an absolute moron isn't easy.

Overall, it was a good show, except for one thing. This guy does the worst Stuart Smalley impression.

Pre-Thanksgiving doldrums not necessarily bad

ZACH HAUSER

All-University homecoming is over, as is all your hard work the week before so you could have fun and not worry about school as much as where to pre-party for the tailgate.

The tailgate had nothing to do with football. It was a Tuesday night party in a truck bed with a box of Gumby's and a bowl of sangria, and that's as much as you can remember.

So, now you're sitting back and realizing just how motivated you are to do relatively little, but is simply being satisfied with where you are in life and not being spurred to change the same as not being motivated and thus lazy?

The art of resting before you're tired is taking over America, and it seems as though most are unwilling to fight a little sleep when it feels oh-so-good.

The laziest time during the fall semester is the time between homecoming and Thanksgiving. This is because Halloween just doesn't count as a holiday and also because, after Turkey Day, it's time to focus on finals.

The secret to success in the latter is saying no to Buddy Light on the weekdays. Yes, friends, those attendance points can't hurt, either.

Now everyone has good intentions like, "I'm going to stay in on Saturday and study all day."

I'm sure many of you, like myself, took textbooks with you during fall break and promised yourself you would get stuff done. Well, it didn't happen for most of us, did it?

The hardest part of studying is starting, and the first thing everyone needs to realize is that, though noble, it's incredibly hard to focus on a book when there's a television on, people are having fun in the next room and it's really early in the evening.

Take my advice and go somewhere really quiet and unpopular with the loud folks. Visiting the fourth floor of Hale Library might be a bit of a hike, and fairly eerie since it's usually so quiet – you feel like you're being obnoxious just by walking down the hall with squeaky shoes.

Paying a visit to Hale usually lets you do one of four things: falling asleep and waking up with textbook marks on your forehead, studying, taking 45 minutes to check your e-mail so other people can't use the computer and pretending to do homework while flirting with people who are pretending to do homework.

You decide what works for you. Just remember that what works best in terms of you not being lonely on a Friday night might not be the best option for you and Mr. grade point average.

We can't, however, forget the token coffee house for the late night caffeine kick when studying. It sounds like a good choice – making some quality time just for you, your over-priced textbooks and a double – make that a triple – latté.

There's a problem, though, which Chris Farley stated well: "That's a pretty girl over there, Richard."

So, now you're hopped up on the coffee equivalent of juju beans and a proud supporter of the Colombian economy. Your next move just happens to be to the table next to Julie "You won't get any work done sitting next to a pretty girl" Grover.

You have a choice. Like a champ, you want to have your cake and eat it, too, so why not do a little of both, and come away from the evening with a little work done and a new friend.

For all go-getters out there, take this aphorism to heart: "Hard work has a future, laziness pays off now."

Just be sure that in between your escapades of hard work, you don't forget to mix work with play.

Palestine gains new government

Qureia, Arafat say peace talks should resume

By Mohammed Daraghmeh
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMALLAH, West Bank – Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat swore in a new Palestinian Cabinet on Wednesday, getting the government he wanted after a long wrangle and setting the stage for a renewed push to implement the stalled, U.S.-backed road-map peace plan.

The new government earlier won a vote of confidence from Palestinian legislators after Arafat – who appears to have survived the Israeli-American effort to sideline him – joined Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia in calling for an end to three years of violence that has claimed thousands of lives.

"The time has come between us and you Israelis ... to get out of this cycle of destructive war," Arafat said, referring to the violence that buried an ambitious effort to end a century of Arab-Israeli enmity.

Israeli officials said they will give the new premier a chance to restore calm, and Islamic militant groups said they will consider a cease-fire. Officials on both sides said they expected Qureia and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to meet soon.

The approval of the Cabinet, which was sworn in Wednesday, ended a two-month stalemate that stymied efforts to implement the peace plan accepted by both sides six months ago.

The plan authored by the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia calls for an end to violence and the creation of a Palestinian state by 2005.

In the interim, Israel is to freeze settlement construction and the Palestinian security forces are to dismantle militant groups – moves that have not occurred.

Qureia broke the stalemate Sunday by giving in to Arafat on the crucial question of who controls Palestinian security and police, leaving the veteran leader effectively in charge of most forces.

Parliament approved the Cabinet despite some lawmaker complaints it too closely resembled previous corrupt governments.

Israel and the United States, which accused Arafat of stoking terrorism, wanted the security agencies removed from his jurisdiction. In September, Israel declared it would act to "remove" Arafat.

But Israeli officials – who face public pressure to find a way out of the violence – suggested Wednesday they primarily were interested in restoring quiet.

"If the new Palestinian government is serious about pursuing peace and takes action to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism, they will find Israel to be a real partner," Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said.

Raanan Gissin, Sharon's spokesman, urged Qureia to halt militant attacks on Israelis and consolidate security forces under one authority.

"We're prepared to give Ahmed Qureia a grace period and judge him by the results," Gissin said.

'Kissing disease' infects most before the age of 22

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

By age 22, 95 percent of people contract the Epstein-Barr virus, also known as mononucleosis, said Jay Reppert, physician at Lafene Health Center.

The Center for Disease Control's Web site, www.cdc.org, said the "kissing disease," as it sometimes is referred to, is one of the most common human viruses. Reppert said that once a person is infected, they are unlikely to contract the virus again.

"Once a person gets the virus, they can show the same symptoms again, but it is unlikely they will come down with mono again," Reppert said.

Reppert said the symptoms include fever, swollen lymph nodes, a tired feeling and sore throat.

"A person can have some of the symptoms or all of the symptoms. Depending on the severity of the case, they may not have two of them," Reppert said.

Reppert said that contrary to popular belief, mono is not highly contagious.

Did you know?
Mononucleosis

- Signs of mono include fever, sore throat, headaches, white patches on the back of your throat, swollen glands in your neck, feeling tired and not feeling hungry.
- Mono is not spread as easily as some other viruses, such as the common cold, but is found in saliva and mucus.
- The main concern with mono is that the spleen will enlarge and even rupture, although this is rare.
- To avoid a ruptured spleen, doctors advise that patients avoid any sports that could inflict a blow to the stomach.

Source: www.familydoctor.org

"Two people living together that don't have the virus are just as likely to receive the virus as a roommate to a person with mono," Reppert said.

There are few medications that can treat the virus. Antibiotics do not work because it is a virus. The researchers for www.webmd.com implicate that the Epstein-Barr virus is present in roughly one-third of Hodgkin's disease cases.

Reppert said the percentage of K-State students who have contracted the virus is near the 95 percent he reported for all people.

"We have people come in a lot that say their roommate has mono, and they think that they've got it too, but, as I said, the virus isn't as contagious as people think," Reppert said.

When a student enters Lafene for what they think could be mono, Reppert said there are tests that will tell what the problem is. He said a monospot can be done, or testing of the blood.

"Sometimes, the blood test won't show up positive, even if the person does have mono. It can take a week for the test results to show positive," Reppert said.

Reppert said the recover time from mono is about 30 to 60 days, and bed rest is the best way to get better.

"If someone contracts the virus at a younger age, they will most likely deal with the illness better than an older person. It is less likely that a person will get mono when they're in college," Reppert said.

Residents of bombed compound claim they were targeted because of Westernized lifestyle

By Adnan Malik
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia – Residents of the mainly Arab residential compound attacked by suspected al Qaeda suicide bombers said Wednesday they knew their Westernized lifestyle was under scrutiny – they'd received a surprise visit from Saudi religious police suspicious that men and women were mixing at a party.

The choice of target in the attack, which killed 17 people, mostly Arabs and Muslims, has baffled many in the region – and indicates al Qaeda's rage may be directed as much at Muslims seen as having slipped from the religion's true path as at Western "infidels."

Saudi and U.S. officials have blamed Saturday's attack on Osama bin Laden's al Qaeda, the militant Muslim terror network blamed for the Sept. 11 attacks and a sworn enemy of the Saudi ruling family, which it accuses of being insufficiently Islamic and too close to the United States.

On Tuesday, a purported al Qaeda operative claimed responsibility for Saturday's bombing, saying in an e-mail that al Qaeda believed "working with Americans and mixing with them" was forbidden.

The e-mail was sent to the London-based Arabic weekly Al-Majalla.

Most of the residents of the Muhaya compound were Lebanese. Seven Lebanese were among the dead; other victims came from Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Sudan.

Muhaya was typical of compounds housing members of the large contingent of foreign workers in Saudi Arabia: a place where non-Saudis could escape rules banning alcohol and mixing of men and women in public and requiring women to cloak and veil themselves when outside their homes.

Muhaya had a coffee shop where residents of both sexes chatted over water pipes and watched foreign movies and other entertainment on a big screen television.

It was located next to a pool where women swam in bikinis.

Agents of the Saudi religious police – the Committee for the Propagation of Virtue and Prevention of Vice – roam Saudi streets and shopping malls berating or even manhandling those who violate the social code.

Its chief holds the rank of Cabinet minister in a kingdom where the royal family retains power in part with the support of conservative religious authorities.

KU slaps tradition in the face by denying seats

JOEL REICHENBERGER

Insatiable greed has swept over the University of Kansas.

The Jayhawks forced the family of their greatest basketball coach to give up seats in Allen Fieldhouse.

A rule that forbids children from inheriting tickets from their parents proved to doom Forrest Allen, Phog Allen's grandson, to worse seats, and eventually might price him right out of decent seats all together.

It's all part of an ever-increasing infatuation with athletic department funding across the country.

The Jayhawks are debating the adoption of a staged seating plan for KU basketball season ticket- holders to earn better seats in recognition of higher donations.

Several years ago, K-State adopted a similar system for seating at football games. Students who look across from their ICAT seats to the chairbacks below the press box should know those don't come cheap.

Massive contributions help fund K-State athletics. Donations build new facilities to keep pace with universities around the nation.

Lists are established and the size of contributions can affect more than just seats and home games. Donors have the first shot at away-game tickets and receive special consideration when bowl and championship game tickets are available.

Perhaps donations are the way of life for Division-I sports programs. If K-State didn't stock the newest and the fanciest, recruits could be lost, training could falter and the product on the field would not be the same.

What isn't a part of college sports is taking a big number two on your school's history.

Phog Allen's grandson can't keep his seats? Come on, KU, your stupid building is named after the coach. Allen won a National Championship and more than 500 games.

KU fans love to warn opponents of the Phog. If the "Phog" was around now, the only person who'd need beware is the greedy little athletic director who failed to stop this from happening.

What kind of KU fan takes those seats, anyway? In 50 years I will be sitting in Bill Snyder Stadium watching the amazing Wildcats play football. If Snyder's grandson walks down my aisle looking for a place to rest, I'd clear out the entire row.

Runners gear up for championships

Midwest Region Championships takes the Cats back to Oklahoma

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A familiar location will provide the backdrop this Saturday as the K-State cross country teams compete in the Midwest Region Championships in Stillwater, Okla.

Racing begins at 10 a.m. at the Oklahoma State Cross Country Course, as Wildcat runners seek a strong finish to the season.

This is not the first time K-State has run the Stillwater course this year, though.

The Wildcats' third meet, the Cowboy Jamboree, was at the same site, with the men and women placing tenth and eighth respectively.

After the Oct. 4 meet, Coach Randy Cole felt the experience gained from the course would help the Wildcats at the future regional meet.

"Next time out, we'll hopefully be able to attack the course better," Cole said.

The Wildcat men are coming off a ninth-place finish at the Big 12 Championships. Junior Mathew Chesang led the charge placing fifth, earning him All-Big 12 honors.

Trevor Smith runs at the Wildcat Invitational at Stateland Cross Country Course in Topeka on Sept. 13.

Both are expected to lead the way for the Wildcats on Saturday.

On the women's side, freshman Stefanie Murer enters the Midwest Regional meet with significant momentum after leading the team to a seventh-place finish at the Big 12 Championships.

Murer's performance also topped all freshmen in the conference.

Wildcats rally back from 2-0 deficit to beat Missouri 3-2

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Going into Wednesday's match at Missouri, coach Suzie Fritz knew her team was facing a tough conference test.

The Tigers held up their end of the bargain but couldn't hold off a K-State rally as the Cats pulled out a narrow 3-2 victory.

With the win, the 5th-ranked Cats are guaranteed to remain in first place atop the Big 12 when they host 10th-ranked Nebraska at 7 p.m. on Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

Leading the Cats was senior Lauren Goehring, who racked up 19 kills on her way to a .375 hitting percentage.

Junior Lisa Martin added 16 kills, while fellow junior Valeria Hejjas and senior Cari Jensen each chipped in with 12.

K-State came out strong early in game one to take a 10-7 lead, eventually increasing it to 25-22 before Missouri scored eight of the next 10 to take the game 30-27.

Finding themselves down 18-17 in game two, the Cats couldn't contain the serving of the Tigers' Shen Danru, who served Missouri to a 9-0 run that would boost them to a 30-19 win.

After dropping the first two games, K-State knew they were facing an uphill battle.

"I didn't think we were in a good offensive rhythm, and our focus was to play better."

Suzie Fritz
WOMEN'S VOLLEYBALL COACH

Fritz said the general attitude in the locker room after game two was that the team wasn't playing up to its level.

"We weren't playing real well going into the locker room after game two," Fritz said. "I didn't think we were in a good offensive rhythm, and our focus was to play better."

They responded, taking game three in a 31-29 nail biter. Taking a 30-29 lead on a Tiger error, Goehring and junior Gabby Guerre blocked a Missouri attack for the win.

One of the differences later in the match, Fritz said, was the serving of Missouri.

"I don't know if they let up, or if we got in a little better rhythm," Fritz said. "They were serving incredibly aggressively in the match, scoring five or six points at a time. It's tough to win volleyball games like that."

Students participate in UPC game show during lunch hour

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students answered trivia questions to win prizes Wednesday during the lunch hour.

The Union Program Council sponsored the Game Show Road Show in the Union Courtyard from noon to 1 p.m.

Student Body President John O'Hara was the celebrity contestant. He said he was invited to participate by UPC.

O'Hara said the game show was fun, and he won a K-State sweatshirt.

He answered three questions correctly, but missed one – the theme from the movie "Free Willy."

Garett Relph, junior in political science, said he knew some answers during his round but didn't always earn points for the correct answers.

"It should've been easy, but I was slow buzzing in," he said. "And apparently, NYPD was not based in Boston. I was not aware of that."

Ashley Holmes, special events chair for UPC, said the show has been at K-State in the past.

"They came last year, and it was a success," she said. "The students really liked it, so we brought it back."

To participate, students put their names in a basket. The show's host drew four names at random per round. There were four rounds, each lasting about 15 minutes, Holmes said.

"It's great. It's fun, and I'm sure we'll do it for years to come," she said.

Dave Lewis, owner of the Game Show Road Show, said the group put on last spring's Singled Out show.

"We just started this about a year and a half ago and we've been touring within about 500 miles," he said.

"We developed this and talked about using this as entertainment for UPC."

Lewis said he thought Wednesday's show went well.

"We try to ask questions the contestants that are up there will have a good opportunity of answering correctly. TV, music and movies seem to work the best for this type of group," he said.

Lewis said the show can be customized. There are K-State, University of Kansas and all-Kansas trivia sets, he said. Different trivia questions are used for different groups.

Former POW from Kansas talks about capture in Iraq with Jessica Lynch's Army unit

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, MO. – A Kansas soldier who was captured in Iraq with Jessica Lynch says he shot and killed members of an Iraqi mortar team as they were getting ready to launch an attack on his American colleagues.

"They were going to shoot and kill me, or I was going to shoot and kill them," Pfc. Patrick Miller said in an interview broadcast Tuesday night on Kansas City television station KMBC-TV.

"It was no in-between, what if this, what if that. It was either me or them. And in my mind, it wasn't going to be me."

Miller, 23, of Valley Center, Kan., was with the Army's 507th Maintenance Company, which had 11 soldiers killed and six captured during an ambush in March. Among the soldiers taken prisoner was Lynch, also a private first class who has been telling her much-publicized story in a book published this week and in national television interviews.

Miller had been in the Army only eight months when he was sent to Iraq, assigned to work as a welder with the maintenance unit.

"I wasn't really worried about going, because I never thought anything would happen," said Miller.

But he was driving a truck bound for Bagdhdad on March 23 when members of his his unit made a wrong turn and ended up under attack from Iraqi soldiers.

His truck shot out, Miller scrambled for cover when he noticed an Iraqi truck that he thought he could take and use to get some of his comrades to safety.

"If I got to the dump truck I was trying to steal, it might've been a whole different story," he said.

But as he approached the truck, he saw the Iraqi mortar team set up beside it.

Miller, who said he was at best an average shot during basic training, told KMBC's Martin Augustine he hid behind a sand dune and started killing the Iraqi mortarmen one-by-one.

Miller, eventually captured and later released, subsequently was awarded the Silver Star for his actions, but said he was no hero, just a private first class.

"I was doing what I volunteered to do," he said.

After he and his fellow soldiers were set free, there were stories of Miller pestering the Iraqi guards by constantly singing a pro-American song, and by giving them chewing tobacco that he said was candy in hopes of making them sick.

"It's small victories that keep your hope up," Miller said. "You got to have small victories when you're in a situation like that."

Miller recalled one of the soldiers who died, Sgt. Don Walters, whose wife and family live in Kansas City, as a man he could go to for advice.

He didn't want to talk about Lynch and the publicity surrounding her, and is not allowed to discuss the conditions during his captivity.

Miller hasn't decided whether he'll re-enlist with the Army. He said he was offered the chance to leave the military after returning home but turned it down, saying he didn't want to look like a quitter.

Judge keeps hazing decision under wraps

By Jason Straziuso
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HONESDALE, Pa. – A judge decided Wednesday whether three teenage boys accused of sexually assaulting three younger teammates at an overnight football camp would be tried as adults or juveniles, but ordered the decision sealed.

The outraged reaction outside the courthouse from relatives of the alleged victims suggested the judge decided against trying the three students from Mepham High School in Bellmore, N.Y., as adults.

"What a message he's sending to America, he's telling juveniles to come to Pennsylvania to commit a crime," said Kris Reichstein, mother of a Mepham student, who traveled to the hearing in support of the alleged victims.

David Woycik, an attorney for one of the alleged victims, said he could not talk about the hearing, but told an aunt of one of the alleged victims, "This thing is not over, the judge can keep them under detention here for a long time, until they're 21."

Wayne County District Attorney Mark Zimmer said the judge ordered him not to disclose the ruling under penalty of contempt. He declined further comment.

The three Long Island students had been charged with numerous felonies for allegedly sodomizing younger teammates with broomsticks, pine cones and golf balls during a week-long summer training camp in August in Preston Park, about 125 miles north of Philadelphia.

Prosecutors had asked that the students be tried in adult court, where they could face prison sentences if convicted.

About 50 supporters of the alleged victims gathered outside the courthouse in Honesdale on Wednesday, some wearing green ribbons and holding signs with slogans including, "Prison, not probation," and "Sodomy doesn't equal probation."

Woycik said criminal hearings would be held in the coming weeks and he would pursue a civil case against the school district.

Relatives said the three alleged victims' mothers testified during the hearing, which began in the early afternoon. The three alleged victims did not testify. The judge relied on written depositions from them.

The team's head coach, Kevin McElroy, did not speak to reporters after emerging from the courthouse.

After the allegations became public, the Bellmore-Merrick school board canceled the team's season. It has since informed McElroy and four other football coaches that they will not participate in the athletic program next year.

players, four of the top seven women's basketball teams in the country and one coach already in the Hall of Fame.

"We're very delighted to be a part of it," Patterson said. "We're just extremely honored to have the opportunity to be in this great field. This is a great event that honors our game and is a great kickoff to the season."

The Classic, now in its 11th season, will be host to the first and second regular season games of the year at Mackey Arena in West Lafayette, Ind.

"It's a an honor to be a representative in one of the most prestigious events in our sport," Texas coach Jody Conradt said.

"It's even more exciting for all of us because this is the first game of our season. We're not just playing quality opponents, but in a quality event that everyone across the country can watch."

K-State and Texas are first-time participants in the event, while Duke and Purdue will be playing in their second and fourth Classics, respectively.

"This is an event where they can choose anybody in America to participate," Patterson said.

"It's exciting to see Kansas State achieving that level of recognition."

After the Duke-Texas matchup at 1:30 p.m. Sunday, K-State will take the floor at 4 p.m. against Purdue.

"We feel thankful and blessed to be hosting this premier event," Purdue coach Kristy Curry said. "It's important for us to stage the event in the manner that all four teams deserve. We are hoping to have a full house there and it should be a lot of fun and excitement in Mackey Arena."

As of Tuesday, about 4,000 tickets remained in what is expected to be a sold-out crowd of 14,123. Both games also will be carried live on ESPN2.

"I'm really excited," Duke coach Gail Goestenkors said. "The fans have always been wonderful there. The greatest feeling I've ever had was when we walked out for an ESPN game against Iowa. It's an unbelievable feeling walking through that tunnel and hearing the crowd go crazy. "

All proceeds from the event benefit the Women's Basketball Hall of Fame, which will also announce its Class of 2004.

"I think it's incredible the respect we've been getting over the past couple of years and to put ourselves in a position that we are in," Wecker said.

"It's going to be a great Classic just seeing Duke and Texas go head-to-head and then us with Purdue. We're definitely excited and can't wait to go to West Lafayette and play."

COLUMN | Denying seats a sign of disrespect for family tradition

Snyder is a living legend in 2003. Imagine how he'll be remembered in 2053. Any K-State fan who dare not move his rump so Snyder's offspring can watch the game wouldn't deserve to be there in the first place.

It's about tradition. Allen helped build the monstrosity that is KU basketball. As much as I hate it, I have to respect it. The Jayhawks have a dizzying array of championships, league titles and wins over my beloved Cats.

Allen was a large part of that tradition. So KU says, screw tradition? Just hop in line, Jayhawks, let's go over and build a trendy shopping mall on ol' Phog's grave. As long as another doctor or lawyer gets a great seat, who cares?

Is anything sacred anymore?

Yes, but just one thing. It's green. We all want it, but apparently KU will stop at nothing to get it. It's the only thing that will keep a true Jayhawk from ever donning the purple.

Please remember this, President Wefald, Athletic Director Weiser, and everyone else in the Wildcat Nation: heritage is our most prized possession.

Please don't ever sell it out like the idiot's up the river.

VOLLEYBALL | K-State takes early lead in game toward victory

Down 7-5 in game four, the Cats scored 12 of 14 to take an 18-9 lead en route to winning 30-20 and force a decisive fifth game.

Leading 5-2 early, K-State never looked back, securing the match with a 15-9 win.

It was the play of her seniors, Fritz said, that propelled the Cats during the final stretch of the match.

Along with Goehring and Cari Jensen, Laura Downey-Wallace added a season-high 26 digs and Kris Jensen chipped in with key serves during the Cats' comeback.

"The four of them were the key to us winning the match," Fritz said. "Lauren was one of the bright spots offensively for us. Laura and Kris played well down the stretch, and Cari went on two big serving runs in game five. I think we win the match because of those four."

CROSS COUNTRY | Iowa trip likely for individual runners

Thirty-one teams and 38 individuals will either qualify at regional meets across the country or be selected at large Nov. 17.

Although the likelihood of the team qualifying for the meet is not high, the prospects of individual runners earning a trip to Iowa is.

With strong performances like those demonstrated at the conference championships, Chesang and Murer could be packing their bags to compete against the nation's elite runners.

But to do that, Cole said race management and the right mindset will be more important than ever.

"We need to push harder in the middle part of the race and know you can do that and still have a good finish," he said.

Hate crimes down in 2002 following Sept. 11 attacks

By Curt Anderson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. – Hate crimes were down sharply in 2002 following a spike the year before that was blamed in part on anti-Muslim and Middle Eastern sentiment after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The 7,462 hate crime incidents reported to the FBI in 2002 represented a drop of nearly 25 percent from the 9,730 reported in 2001, the agency said Wednesday. The number also was below the 8,063 incidents recorded in 2000.

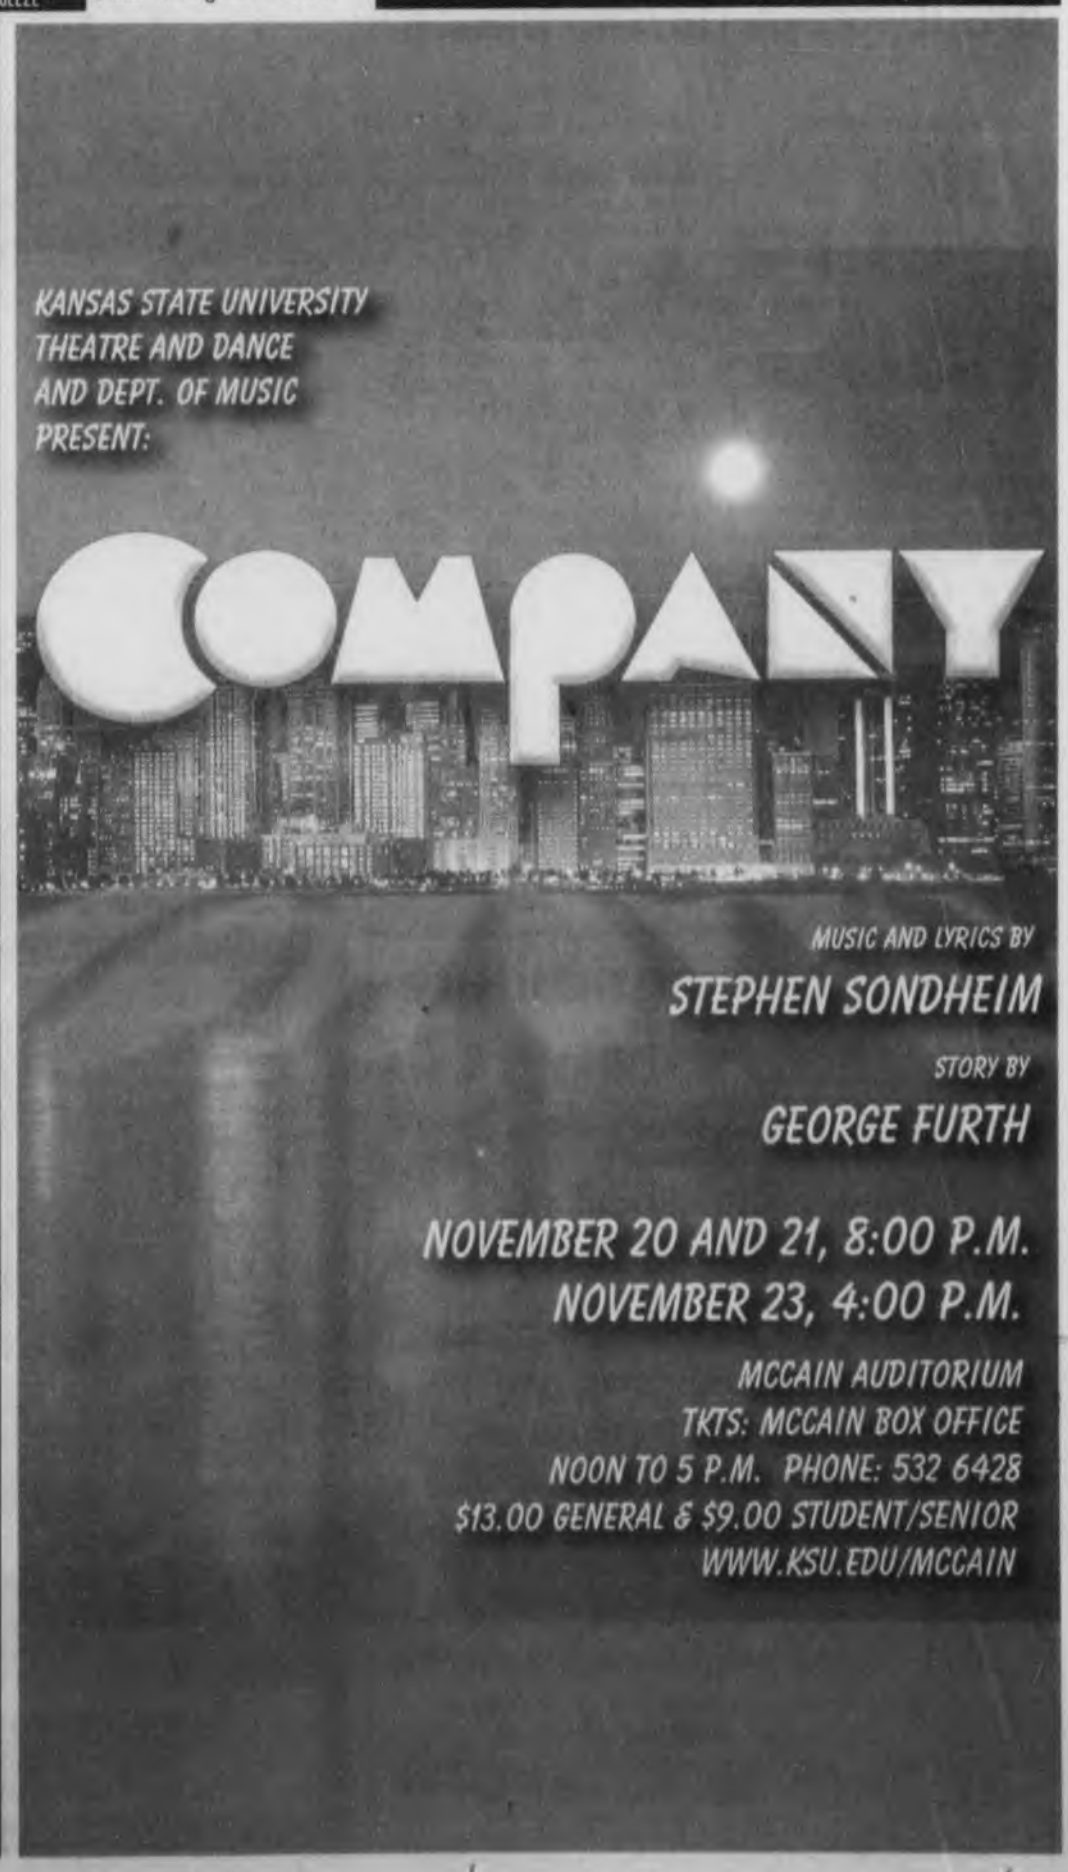
There were 155 hate crime incidents listed as anti-Islamic last year, down sharply from the 481 reported in 2001, when the nation suffered its worst-ever terrorist attack at the hands of Muslim extremists.

In addition, there were 622 hate crime incidents listed in 2002 against ethnic groups that include people of Middle Eastern descent, down from 1,500 in 2001. There were 931 anti-Jewish incidents in 2002, slightly below the number in 2001.

Arab-American and Muslim advocates agreed that hate crimes dropped from 2001 to 2002. But they said these people still suffer disproportionate discrimination in the wake of the Sept 11 attacks and the Iraq war.

"There's an uneasy relationship between the Muslim community and law enforcement," said Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Many Arab-Americans and Muslims fail to report crimes for fear of government harassment, said Dalia Hashad, attorney advocate at the American Civil Liberties Union.



People have grown fearful of contacting the FBI or local police because of government policies like forced registration of mainly Middle Eastern men, perceptions of police profiling in terrorist investigations and more restrictive immigration rules.

Local play captures grief about traditional Shakespearean language in modern way

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ryan Mott threatens Michael Parker with a sword while rehearsing a scene from I Hate Hamlet at Manhattan Art Center on Wednesday night. The play by Paul Rudnick runs Nov. 14-16 and 20-23.

The archaic language of Shakespeare's "Hamlet" has caused so much confusion and grief, that playwright Paul Rudnick wrote a play called "I Hate Hamlet," which will be performed at the Manhattan Art Center for the next two weeks.

"What most people have a problem with is the language, because it creates a barrier," said Michael Parker, senior in pre-professional secondary education, "but the way the plot is described to you is incredible."

"I Hate Hamlet" is the story of Andrew Rally, an actor whose TV show, "LA Medical," was recently canceled. Ryan Mott, Manhattan resident, plays the part of Rally.

In the play, Rally is persuaded by his girlfriend and business manager to move to New York City to play Hamlet in Shakespeare in the Park.

In New York, Rally rents the apartment formerly belonging to John Barrymore, one of the great Hamlets of all time. Rally quickly learns he's in over his head with Hamlet, and Barrymore's ghost, played by Parker, returns to help him prepare for the role.

"With Andrew, at least from his girlfriend and his manager, you get the idea that he idolizes Barrymore," Mott said. "Once Barrymore appears, and Andrew is face to face with him, he see's what kind of person Barrymore really is and he reevaluates this.

"Barrymore teaches him a lot, not only about Hamlet but also about what kind of actor Andrew is," Mott said.

Derek Richards, senior in theater, plays the quirky and energetic producer of a new TV show for which he's recruiting Rally. He said he disliked Shakespeare until he took a theater history class.

"Now I like him. If you read what other writers were writing at that time, it's garbage," Richards said.

"He makes the story so beautiful, so simplistic and understandable with feelings and emotion."

He said today's equivalent would be seeing a very abstract art film that is hard to follow, and then seeing another film done right with great sound and a great director.

"It's just how you understand it, it comes through very well, and that's why I like Shakespeare right now."

Director of "I Hate Hamlet" Roger Adams said "Hamlet" is his favorite work in the English language.

"It's so complex. Of course, Shakespeare borrowed from other older stories, but the stories are timeless," he said.

Mott said the play fulfills its title, "I Hate Hamlet," and there definitely is empathy for people who have a hard time with Shakespeare plays. But people who enjoy "Hamlet" also will enjoy this play.

"They'll pick up on the lines that are quoted from it and understand what they mean," he said. "People who don't like Shakespeare will appreciate their frustrations with Shakespeare."

For Parker, playing the ghost of a famous actor is more about creating a fun character than an accurate one.

"My personal opinion is that the character is just based on him, and I'm having a little bit more fun than he would have," Parker said. "You have to be larger than life, but you can still play this character, because it's not totally John Barrymore."

Dedra is a 29-year-old virgin, and she tells everybody. Mott said she comes from a family that has given her everything and she's never been unhappy.

"She's almost childlike in some ways with her bad acting and lofty goals," he said.

She gets a small role in "Hamlet" because of Andrew. Mott said Dedra is not a good actor and overdoes a roll with no lines.

"She's got some really good lines," he said. "It's like, where are you? Come back from space."

However, right before she exits she gives part of Ophelia's speech and all of a sudden she is transformed into the wonderful actress Mott knows she has in her. Adams, on the other hand, said he can't pick a favorite character.

"I do play favorites when I have to, but without any one of these characters, the play would be unbalanced," he said.

"I'm serious when I say without anyone one of the characters the play would not be as funny as it is."

Senate conducts 30-hour debate over nominations to federal appeals court

By Jesse J. Holland
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – With humor, anger and a show of GOP unity, the Senate on Wednesday launched 30 hours of uninterrupted debate on President Bush's political nominees not making it to the federal appeals bench, setting up cots and preparing to cast blame at each other throughout the night.

Most of Republicans marched into the Senate together just before 6 p.m., sat down and listened to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., open the debate by condemning the filibusters.

"Tonight we embark upon an extraordinary session," Frist said.

"For the next 30 hours Republicans and Democrats will debate the merits of three judicial nominees. We will be considering the meaning of our constitutional responsibilities to advise and consent on nominations. We will discuss whether there is a need to enact filibuster reform so that nominations taken to the floor can get a vote."

Democrats, some appearing amused by the pomp and circumstance, already were in the Senate chamber waiting for the beginning of the debates. The Senate had just finished a vote, and many of the GOP senators had to leave the chamber just to be in the group marching back in.

Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, held a sign he displayed for television cameras and passing Republican senators as they entered the chamber: "I'll be home watching 'The Bachelor.'"

Another Democratic sign, a big purple sign with gold "168 to 4" written on it – the number of judicial nominees confirmed by the Senate as opposed to the number blocked by Democrats – upset Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H. "That is clearly against the Senate rules," said Gregg, who had Democrats remove it until their turn to speak.

Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., and Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., condemned the Republicans for leaving an appropriations bill to launch the debate. "I'm sorry that we can't finish this bill," she said.

While most of the focus will be on the Senate floor, senators plan to buttress their cases by holding news conferences throughout the night condemning the opposing side for its tactics: Republicans on the Democratic filibusters, Democrats on the Republicans' "reverse filibuster."

Democrats have used the threat of a filibuster to block four U.S. Appeals Court nominees so far: Alabama Attorney General William Pryor, Texas judge Priscilla Owen, Mississippi judge Charles Pickering and lawyer Miguel Estrada. Others, including California judges Carolyn Kuhl and Janice Rogers Brown, are expected to be blocked by Democrats as well.

Frustrated at the delays, Estrada withdrew his nomination in September.

In turn, Republicans – who control the Senate – scheduled the 30-hour debate despite their effort to finish bills revamping Medicare and energy policy, plus eight overdue spending bills in time to adjourn by Nov. 21.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, speaks during a filibuster in the Senate chamber Wednesday, Nov. 12, 2003, on Capitol Hill in Washington in this image from video. The Senate headed into 30 hours of uninterrupted debate through the night Wednesday on President Bush's blocked judicial nominees, readying cots just outside the chamber and scheduling overnight shifts for Democrats and Republicans to confront one another.

"We only wish they would devote the kind of attention they are to these 30 hours to the matters that the American people care most about," said Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D.

"They care a lot about the fact that 3 million of them don't have jobs. They care a lot about the fact that their health insurance is rising by more than 15 percent a year."

But Republicans want to draw attention to the blockades, having failed multiple times to get the 60 votes to force the confirmations in a Senate split with 51 GOP senators, 48 Democrats and one independent.

"Through our actions tonight, Republicans hopefully will be able to focus more attention on this problem, which in turn might stimulate enough outrage by the American public to sway at least a few more Democratic senators to do the right thing and give these nominees a vote," said Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz.

Not since 1994 has the Senate been in session past 4 a.m., Senate observers said.

Both sides set up strategy rooms right off the Senate floor with large screen televisions and props to help make their case to reporters and late-night C-SPAN viewers. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., for example, had a T-shirt saying "We confirmed 98 percent of President Bush's judges" on the front while the back said "and all we got was this lousy T-shirt."

Sales tax regulation under panel scrutiny

Businesses might see break in future taxes

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – A legislative study committee agreed Wednesday that the state should provide relief to businesses struggling with a new sales tax law, but members did not endorse a specific proposal because of the potential cost.

Some business owners have complained that the new law is onerous because it requires retailers to collect sales taxes at the rates imposed where they deliver their goods, rather than where the business is located, as had been the practice for decades.

The change puts the state in a position to collect its sales tax on Internet purchases should Congress reverse a national ban on such taxation. Some state officials believe Kansas could receive $100 million or more from taxes on such purchases.

The state imposes a sales tax of 5.3 percent, but cities and counties can impose their own taxes, meaning the total rate varies from location to location. Some retailers who deliver goods regularly – florists and furniture stores are examples – now must track their sales in more detail and keep more detailed records.

To respond to complaints, the Special Committee on Assessment and Taxation recommended that legislators consider allowing businesses to take income tax credits equal to what they spend on computer software or programming to adjust to the new law. The panel's unanimous voice vote will forward the idea to the 2004 Legislature, which convenes in January.

"What we're trying to target here is small businesses," said Sen. Dave Corbin, R-Towanda, the study committee's chairman.

Corbin suggested that the committee limit the tax credit, perhaps to $500 for each of two years and either limit eligibility by the number of employees a business has, or its annual sales.

But committee members did not adopt any specific guidelines because they did not know how much a tax-credit program would cost the state, though it is likely to be at least several million dollars. The Department of Revenue has estimated that the new law affects between 25,000 and 30,000 businesses.

And some committee members do not think a tax credit program goes far enough. Sen. Les Donovan, R-Wichita, said retailers ought to be able to keep a portion of the tax they collect as compensation for doing the state's work.

Shortly after the new law took effect, Gov. Kathleen Sebelius declared an indefinite grace period preventing the Department of Revenue from enforcing the law.

Some legislators have proposed delaying the law until at least July 1, 2004, while some want to repeal it altogether. However, Sebelius has remained committed to the change because of the potential to tax Internet services.

Florida man arrested; FBI says he was 'perilously close' to carrying out clinic bombings

By Ken Thomas
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI – A man arrested on suspicion of plotting to bomb abortion clinics came "perilously close to carrying out his plans" after casing clinics, studying bomb-making and buying material that could be used in an attack, according to the FBI and court documents.

Stephen John Jordi, 35, was arrested Tuesday after agents arranged a meeting aboard a boat, FBI spokeswoman Beverly Esselbach said. He jumped overboard and was pulled from the ocean by the Coast Guard a half-hour later.

Jordi was in the final stages of planning imminent attacks, U.S. Attorney Marcos Jimenez said. A criminal complaint said Jordi cased several South Florida clinics and discussed bombing one in Macon, Ga.

On Tuesday, Jordi and an FBI source bought gasoline cans, flares, starter fluid and propane tanks – including a large one filled with propane gas, the affidavit said. The source also provided Jordi a .45-caliber pistol, silencer and empty magazines in exchange for $200, the affidavit says. Jordi was arrested later that day.

The affidavit said Jordi had discussed with an FBI source possibly using C-4 plastic explosives, propane tank bombs or pipe bombs and had studied bombing methods throughout the fall.

"He was perilously close to carrying out his plans," Esselbach said.

Jordi admired Paul Hill, who was executed Sept. 3 for killing an abortion doctor and his bodyguard outside a Pensacola clinic in 1994, Jimenez said.

Jordi was charged with solicitation to commit a crime of violence; distribution of information relating to making and using explosives for arson; and possession of an unregistered firearm or destructive device.

Jordi admired Paul Hill, who was executed Sept. 3 for killing an abortion doctor and his bodyguard outside a Pensacola clinic in 1994, Jimenez said. According to the affidavit, Jordi showed the FBI source a letter in which Hill thanked Jordi for his moral and financial support.

The affidavit also says Jordi, a former Army Ranger, hoped to be on the run like Eric Rudolph, who is charged with the Olympic park bombing and abortion clinic bombings. The affidavit said Jordi told an FBI source he expected to eventually be hunted by authorities: "As long as I keep hitting places ... they'll keep after me ... but like trying to catch a cockroach in a house ... they won't get me."

Jimenez said the arrest affidavit "makes clear that this is a dangerous person that has now been taken off the streets."

The FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force had been investigating Jordi since August.

Esselbach said Jordi's Coconut Creek house was searched late Tuesday, but she would not comment Wednesday on what was found.

Jordi's brother, Michael Jordi, said by telephone Wednesday that he told the FBI of the plot after learning about it in July. He said he and his brother have a poor relationship, and called him mentally unstable. He said the allegations didn't surprise him.

"That's why we called the FBI. Where he's at (in custody) he needs to be," said Michael Jordi, a Bridgeport, Ala., resident. He refused to comment further.

Stephen Jordi was arrested in 2000 on an allegation of child abuse, but the case was dropped two months later.

Dwight Ward, Stephen Jordi's brother-in-law, said Wednesday he thought Jordi once mentioned to a relative that he might "do something to an abortion clinic." Ward said Jordi never specifically talked about blowing up clinics.

Jordi is "overzealous about the Lord," but not a violent person, Ward said.

Ward said that if the allegations were true, Jordi would only "try to destroy the clinic itself, if anything. He would have done it after hours and hope no one was in there.

"He was trying to discourage the act and not the people behind it."

IRAQ | Terrorism in Middle East continues, U.S. forces target reported headquarters for attacks on coalition forces

At Rome's tomb of the unknown soldier, the green-white-and-red flag rippled at half-staff, and parliament had a minute of silence.

Italian Premier Silvio Berlusconi pledged that Italy's mission in Iraq would not be derailed. Opposition leaders who opposed the deployment to post-war Iraq called on the government to withdraw the contingent.

Jalal Talabani, the head of the Iraqi Governing Council, called the slain Italians "martyrs of the fight for the freedom of Iraq."

There were conflicting accounts of the attack, which took place about 10:40 a.m. at a three-story building used by the Carabinieri's multinational specialist unit in Nasiriyah, 180 miles southeast of Baghdad.

Witnesses said the decoy car ran a roadblock in front of a square where the Italian barracks was located. Guards opened fire but as the vehicle sped away, the fuel tanker approached from the opposite direction and rammed into the gate of the building before exploding.

Italian Defense Minister Antonio Martino said the truck, followed by an armored car, approached the compound at high speed. Gunmen inside one of the vehicles opened fire at Italian troops guarding the entrance, he said. The guards returned fire, but the vehicle plowed through the gate, and then exploded, he added.

It was the 13th vehicle bombing in Iraq since Aug. 7, when a car exploded at the Jordanian Embassy in Baghdad, killing at least 19 people. Wednesday's blast from the estimated 650 pounds of explosives collapsed all three stories of the building, gouged a 6-foot-deep crater in front of it, and set fire to parked cars. Secondary explosions from stored ammunition shook the area.

The scorched, twisted remains of military jeeps littered the parking lot, and bulldozers cleared rubble. Chunks of concrete and wiring hung from partly destroyed walls.

"This is terrorism, pure and simple," Scalas said.

After nightfall in Baghdad, forces from the 1st Armored Division attacked a warehouse used by insurgents, setting off explosions that reverberated throughout the capital.

"The facility is a known meeting, planning, storage and rendezvous point for belligerent elements currently conducting attacks on coalition forces and infrastructure," the Pentagon said.

The mission was part of "Operation Iron Hammer," a new "get tough" policy for confronting insurgents.

Also Wednesday, troops in Baghdad spotted attackers firing mortars, a statement by the 1st Armored Division said. The attackers fled in a van.

An Apache helicopter gunship discovered the van heading out of the city near the Abu Ghraib suburb and opened fire, disabling the vehicle and killing two of the occupants, the statement said. A search of the area turned up one 82mm mortar.

Anja Niedringhaus | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Italian Army soldiers guard their barracks building which was destroyed by a suicide truck bomb in the Italian compound in Nasiriyah, Iraq Wednesday, Nov 12, 2003. The truck is seen at left background.

President Bush met with his top foreign advisers and chief Iraq administrator L. Paul Bremer on Wednesday to discuss the deteriorating security situation and the impasse in drafting an Iraqi constitution.

"We have said from the outset that we wanted to transfer authority to the Iraqis as quickly as they were able to assume it and that is what we have done," Bremer said in Washington. "We have been moving forward on ways to continue to transfer authority to the Iraqis as they are ready for it."

A CIA report warned that Iraqis were losing faith in the U.S.-led forces, which is increasing support for the insurgents.

Secretary of State Colin Powell said there will be "ups and downs in attitudes and feelings. We will remain long enough to make sure the Iraqi people have the opportunity to put in place a government that is democratic."

would meet and discuss which models they wanted to keep.

"It was like 'Survivor,'" he said. "They all get together each night. They will probably only use seven guys and that doesn't mean you get into the catalog. They decide, 'did we get all the shots we wanted from this person?' That happens each night. There were two of us that made it the whole week."

But being a part of the catalog also meant adhering to Abercrombie's marketing strategy, which required nude modeling.

"They asked if I was willing to do nudes," Raile said. "I eventually got talked into it, and I agreed to do it. The last three or four days, my shots were in the mountains."

He said sitting in a stream completely naked while 15 people on the set evaluated the photos was uncomfortable at first.

"At first, it was really weird, but after that I got used to it," he said.

It was after his face appeared in the Abercrombie catalog that Raile's career really began to take off. He got an apartment in New York City for the summers and signed on with a New York City agency.

Since then, Raile has modeled for Joe Boxer, Tommy Hilfiger, Cosmo Girl, Cosmopolitan and Macy's Department Store, as well as the cover of an exercise magazine.

His most prestigious job, however, was a one-year contract with Ralph Lauren.

"It's on billboards, Macy's, Bloomingdales, Sports Illustrated," Raile said. "It was pretty exciting. I was the Polo underwear guy for a year."

Raile said that although being a model means a different lifestyle, it hasn't prevented him from being a regular college student.

"I work out at the Rec four times a week," he said. "I am not a freak about it. I am a hog. I will eat anything. I am not afraid to go to McDonalds. I like to go out to Aggieville and the clubs in New York. I just don't do it to the extreme."

During the summer, Raile attends castings every day, where he participates in test shots, usually in his underwear or in the company's clothes. He carries with him a composition card, which includes a head shot and four different looks as well as his height, weight and sizes.

If a company is interested in Raile, they will request his portfolio, which has 8x10 photos of his different jobs.

In addition to finishing college and fostering his modeling career, Raile is trying to break into the world of acting.

"That's where the big bucks are, but that's not why I am doing it," he said.

Chad Raile, senior in kinesiology, plays pool with his roommate at The Purple Pig on Tuesday night in Aggieville.

Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN

Raile started acting classes every other day for four hours with an acting coach.

"I had four auditions. I did good, and if you can get call-backs without acting class, that's good," he said. "It got me excited."

His first auditions were with the soap operas: "Days of Our Lives," "All My Children" and "As the World Turns."

Although Raile said he is not interested in acting in a soap, the experience helped in his most recent audition for "Hack," a CBS drama on Saturday evenings starring David Morse.

"I came home for July 4, and I was helping with harvest," Raile said.

"I was driving the truck and in between trying to memorize my lines."

After three callbacks, Raile made it to the top 10, but was not chosen.

When he graduates this spring, Raile will move to New York City, where he said he hopes to further is acting career and continue modeling. Eventually, though, he would like to claim Hollywood as his home.

"Hollywood tries to throw you in when you are young," he said. "I want to be good at what I do. I try to focus on acting and cross my fingers."

But amidst the bright lights and dreams of a movie-star future, Raile said he has to stay focused on his education as a Hollywood career is not guaranteed.

"I know it won't last forever. This is a job you don't have any control over," he said. "It could end anytime."

Long hours keep Classy Cats busy

By Oksana Boyko
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They spend 12 hours a week wearing T-shirts and sport pants, losing breath from a hectic pace of practice and getting bruises and strained muscles.

For two hours they put on elegant outfits, style their hair and smile.

Being a Classy Cat means hard work, pain, overwhelming team spirit and only at the very end – a classy look.

Twenty-six members of the K-State Marching Band's dance team are preparing to record a video for the 2004 National Dance Alliance's championship in Orlando, Fla., in March.

For the 90-second video – half a minute of jazz, half a minute of pom and half a minute of funk – girls practice every day for two hours.

New drug law takes effect

New law focuses on treatment rather than prison time

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new Kansas law has officials hoping to solve the problems of the overcrowding prisons and alleviate pains of state budget cuts – all with the help of drug offenders.

The law, which took effect Nov. 1, requires treatment instead of prison time for some drug offenders, namely those individuals who were convicted of drug possession but have no history of violence, said Patricia Biggs, executive director of the Kansas Sentencing Commission.

"This leaves them in the community, but it does not leave them in the community unaided," Biggs said.

However, Capt. Allan Collins, head of the Riley County Police Department corrections department, said there are very limited treatment centers around the Manhattan area – which could be a problem.

Collins, in fact, said he doesn't agree with putting drug offenders in prison or providing treatment to them.

"I don't know that locking people up at $20,000 a year for smoking dope is the answer, but I don't think that putting people in treatment that aren't ready for treatment is the answer either," Collins said. "You have to be ready to change, and when you're ready to change, you don't need treatment anyhow."

All drug offenders that committed offenses on or after July 1 and were sentenced on or after Nov. 1 qualify for the new law.

Fast facts
Drug law

When it took effect
Nov. 1.

What the law says
Individuals convicted of drug possession will be required to undergo treatment as opposed to serving prison time.

Exceptions to the law
Prison time will be required if the person has had a history of violence.

Reason enacted
To ease overcrowding of prisons.

Biggs said one of the main reasons state officials decided to put the law into effect was due to the overcrowding in many state prisons.

"They needed to find something to alleviate the capacitation of the prison system," Biggs said.

As a result, officials decided to focus on treating drug offenders, similar to some California and Arizona laws.

"They did make up a pretty substantial portion of the prison population," Biggs said. "Diverting them is going to free up some beds."

Collins said the Riley County Jail book about 300 people a month, and more than half have some type of connection to a drug offense.

"If you consider all the charges, somehow drugs are behind it," Collins said. "Hot checks, larceny – a lot of stuff is connected if you trace it back."

Another reason for the new law, Biggs said, is related to cost due to state budget cuts.

"One of the things that did happen with the budget was that program dollars had been cut pretty dramatically in prisons," Biggs said. "When an offender came in with a lower sentence, they really weren't getting any treatment while they were in prison."

Biggs said it typically costs $20,000 annually to keep an offender in prison. Treatment, depending on length and type, would cost about $4,200 to $6,000 a year.

Graduate student dies of leukemia; memorial service today

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Memorial services will be held for Vidyaranya Nanduri today at All Faiths Chapel. Vidya died in India on Nov. 7 from leukemia. Vidya was a graduate student in mathematics.

Last January, Vidya was diagnosed with leukemia. There was a bone marrow drive last May to find a donor. No match was found.

Shekhar Gosavi, graduate student in mechanical engineering, was one of Vidya's close friends. He said it is hard to accept that Vidya is gone.

"We went to meet him the Sunday before he went to India," he said. "It still feels like he is in India."

Satish Motipalli, graduate student in mechanical and nuclear engineering, said Vidya was positive in every aspect.

Motipalli said he was shocked when he heard of Vidya's death because he thought Vidya would live a few more years.

Motipalli said that three days before Vidya's death, he called Vidya's home in India and spoke with his father. He said Vidya's father mentioned that he had a high fever and was getting blood transfusions. Motipalli said it seemed like Vidya would recover, but he didn't.

Laxminarayan Muktinutalapati, graduate student in computer science, said that when he heard of Vidya's death he went through disbelief, then shock.

"We were making plans to go see him in India," he said.

Muktinutalapati said he regrets that he procrastinated on calling Vidya. He said that when he called, Vidya wasn't home and it took too long before he contacted him.

"When I tried to call him it was too late," he said. "I didn't expect the end so soon."

Padmanabha Vegesna, vice president of the India Student Association, said Vidya was not easily discouraged.

"He was never the kind of person to be discouraged, even if it was leukemia," he said.

Gosavi said Vidya should be remembered as somebody who wouldn't give up.

JUDD CHARGED WITH DUI

Country singer Wynonna Judd was charged with driving under the influence early Thursday after a city police officer stopped her speeding Land Rover not far from Music Row.

The arrest report states Judd had an odor of alcohol about her, had watery eyes and dilated pupils, and didn't remember how many drinks she had consumed.

The officer said Judd consented to a breath test and registered a blood alcohol level of 0.175 percent – more than twice the 0.08 legal definition of drunken driving.

Television news reports showed her police booking photo Thursday morning.

The officer said the sport utility vehicle was stopped because it was traveling 47 miles per hour in a 30-miles-per-hour zone.

DUI is a misdemeanor in Tennessee with punishment of a fine, community service or up to 48 hours in jail.

Judd, who began her career as half of the mother-daughter act The Judds, posted the standard $500 bond for a first offense and was released.

BURNETT RECEIVES APOLOGY

Carol Burnett got a public apology after a tribute to her was left out of CBS' 75th anniversary special.

"I am sorry that during the excitement of a 'live 3 hour television event' the wonderful film piece we prepared that paid tribute to the 'Carol Burnett Show' was not aired," executive producer Gil Cates said Wednesday in an open letter addressed to "Dear Carol" and published in trade papers.

Burnett

Cates noted that Burnett received a "glorious standing ovation" from the audience in the New York ballroom where the Nov. 2 show was held.

"Sometimes 'goofs' happen. We all feel bad about that. I promise that won't happen on the 100th," Cates wrote in the ad that was published in Daily Variety and The Hollywood Reporter.

There was a touch of irony in the incident. In 2001, CBS scored big ratings with a special on Burnett's 1967-79 variety show. Its popularity triggered a nostalgic flood of tributes to other old series.

It was a skipped cue that failed to bring up clips of Burnett's show before she took the stage, Cates said in an interview Wednesday.

Burnett didn't complain and he apologized to her the next day, he said.

KNOWLES TAKES BREAK FOR MOVIE

Beyonce Knowles enjoyed taking a break from her usual high glamour to play a dowdy single mother in her new movie, "The Fighting Temptations."

Knowles

"It was something different for me to look as unglamorous as possible," said Knowles, wearing a black Versace corset and slinky skirt as she walked the red carpet at the film's premiere in London's Leicester Square.

Knowles – the 22-year-old frontwoman for Destiny's Child – plays a single mother who joins a gospel choir run by Cuba Gooding Jr.

BOXER SUING STALLONE

Former heavyweight boxer Chuck Wepner is suing actor Sylvester Stallone for a share of the profits from the "Rocky" movies, claiming the series was based on Wepner's career.

Wepner, who went nearly 15 punishing rounds in a 1975 loss to Muhammad Ali, claims in a lawsuit filed Wednesday in state Superior Court in Jersey City, N.J., that Stallone repeatedly credits that fight as the inspiration for the 1976 Oscar-winning film. Four sequels followed.

Wepner

"Stallone has been using Chuck's name – and continues to this day – in promoting the 'Rocky' franchise without any permission or compensation," said Anthony Mango, Wepner's lawyer.

Michelle Vega, Stallone's publicist, declined comment.

Mango estimates the five "Rocky" films and associated products have brought in over $1 billion. Wepner is entitled to part of that, the lawyer said.

The lawsuit claims Stallone made several promises to Wepner that he would be financially compensated over the years, but no payments were made, Mango said.

PORN KING LARRY FLYNT BEING SUED

The lawsuit, filed Monday in Superior Court, claims that someone gave Flynt photos taken by Shane Barbi's husband, actor Ken Wahl. The photographs, taken earlier this year, show "intimate sexual acts between the twin sisters," the lawsuit said.

Flynt

"They've had some nude photos before but ... this is not the kind of work they want to do anymore," said their lawyer, Jeff Le Beau.

The man who sold the pictures to Flynt also wrote an article describing the contact between Shane and Sia Barbi during the photography session, according to the lawsuit.

The women want the photos back and do not want them published in any of Flynt's publications. They also are seeking unspecified damages.

The twins claim the photos will damage their career, which now includes hosting a health talk show, publishing their own health magazine and distributing various health product lines.

Sociology students file complaints about instructor

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"I found the behavior of the student to be very hostile towards me and very intimidating."

Mani Pande
DOCTORAL STUDENT IN SOCIOLOGY

Complaints from an instructor about students – and from students about their instructor – have prompted officials to investigate a Sociology of Women class.

The Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work is exercising means of handling the complaints.

Two students who were enrolled in Mani Pande's Sociology 545 class no longer are members of her section of the course.

Pande, a doctoral student in sociology, said one student was removed from the class at the dean's discretion. However, Department Head Leonard Bloomquist said two students were not removed but given the option to complete the course under the supervision of another professor.

Pande said she felt one student's behavior was unacceptable.

"I found the behavior of the student to be very hostile towards me and very intimidating," Pande said.

As a result of this, she said, the Department of Affirmative Action has become involved, though the details of their involvement are unclear at this time.

Susana Valdovinos, Associate Director of the K-State Department of Affirmative Action, said the department can neither confirm nor deny anything regarding the case.

One of the students who was removed from the class has been contacted, but refused to comment on the issue.

Due to privacy concerns and possible pending litigation, his name cannot be released. The other student was unavailable for comment.

After attending Pande's class and speaking to the students, Bloomquist said he feels the problem has now been resolved.

"As far as I know, there isn't anything that is going on anymore," he said. "There was one student who was not happy with the way the class was going."

Bloomquist said his investigation found the students' claims to be invalid, and he spoke to the class to address any concerns the students might have.

He told the Collegian that accusations such as this were common in classes of this nature.

Pande said she could confirm rumors that the class had been videotaped, but said it was unrelated to the incident.

Pande said students in the class have been sending her several e-mails and have behaved, both in and out of class, in a manner that she believes is inappropriate.

Kendra Spencer, sophomore in sociology and a student in the class, said she believes Pande has problems taking criticism.

"When she feels like we are stepping on her toes, she responds negatively," Spencer said. "We are just trying to help. We point out mistakes so that everyone can get them right."

Jamie Fischer, junior in psychology and also a student, said she agrees.

"She is not ready for class quite often and gets very hostile when she has any type of criticism towards her," Fischer said. "She has said before that we are 'just students' and that we are beneath her."

Fischer said Pande has claimed two students were removed because they were discriminating against her based on her status as a female and an international student.

"I don't think the students in question did anything wrong," Fischer said. "She misinterpreted it."

Spencer said she didn't believe it was right the students were removed.

"I think she was making a statement," she said. "(One of the students) approached her like an adult and she didn't take it very well."

Barbee Jorns, senior in social science, said she thought Pande handled the situation well, and has overall been very fair with everyone in the class.

"Overall, I think she's a really good instructor," Jorns said. "The student was not really causing trouble, but was more of a distraction, I guess."

Bloomquist said that when he spoke to the class, he encouraged the students to contact him with any issues.

"Several students, unsolicited, spoke to me and expressed their support for Ms. Pande," he said

Company proposes wind farm

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DE SOTO, Kan. - A proposal for a wind farm is the latest suggestion for developing the former Sunflower Army Ammunition Plant site near De Soto, advanced two days before a deadline set by Johnson County officials.

The $70 million plan being pushed by a company from Lenexa calls for erecting 40 wind turbines, 387 feet tall, to generate electricity.

"Kansas could become the No. 1 energy exporting state in the nation," said Troy Helming, chief executive of Kansas Wind Power L.L.C. "Why not put the world's first renewable energy research park in Johnson County?"

Helming acknowledges, however, that the 9,065-acre Sunflower site is not the ideal location for a wind farm. Ideally, wind farms are proposed for remote locations out of the path of development and on undesirable land.

"It's not the best site by any means in Kansas," Helming said. "I would consider it a mediocre site at best. But because of its close proximity to the metropolitan area the transmission of the power generated from the site would be easier."

Still, Helming's plan is the only one for the site other than one proposed last year by Kessinger/Hunter Inc. of Kansas City, which wants to develop a more traditional community-in-a-park and research center.

Johnson County commissioners set Saturday as the deadline for all Sunflower development proposals, but also have said they wouldn't rule out new ideas surfacing after that.

"It doesn't mean we're not going to listen to other ideas afterward, but at some point Kessinger/Hunter is going to get so far ahead that it isn't going to matter," said Don Jarrett, the commission's attorney and chief Sunflower negotiator.

Kansas Wind Power first expressed interest in Sunflower in an Oct. 27 letter to the county.

"It's a good-faith proposal," Jarrett said. "It will take more evaluation and it will take some sit-down discussion."

"I hope we can find some creative use for the property, and it sounds like this is certainly an alternative to the standard development," said Commissioner Ed Peterson, an attorney who does some consulting work for Kansas Wind Power.

Peterson said he had monitored regulations made by the Kansas Corporation Commission and advised the firm as to what they could mean for it. Such consulting, he said, should not preclude him from having a voice in how a redevelopment authority to oversee Sunflower is established.

Last year, the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, a nonpartisan citizen lobbying effort, labeled Kansas the No. 1 place in the nation for wind power development. More than a dozen developers, some from Europe, have been looking for sites in the state to develop wind farms.

TO THE POINT

Drug rehab preferable to prison time

Minor drug offenses do not warrant jail time, and a law will help ease jail overcrowding by putting minor offenders into drug treatment programs.

Possession or use of some drugs, like marijuana, are not harmful to society at large and affect only the user. In such cases, offenders can enter drug treatment to learn to protect themselves from the drugs.

People who abuse more addictive or serious drugs, such as crack or heroin, and those who push or deal drugs to others should face stiffer punishments, since they are more likely to have a negative effect on society at large by creating new groups of drug abusers.

The $20,000 per year it costs taxpayers to contain a drug offender – and the personal strain it costs the convicted – is too high a price for a minor offense.

Drug treatment centers have the potential to be a preventative role in eliminating drug problems in Kansas and in America. If they are run successfully, they could be answers to many questions about the war on drugs.

By clearing up space in prisons and decreasing the prison population, the new law will allow time, effort and money to go toward fighting more dangerous drugs and other crimes.

Ivy inequality

New York Times report exposes discrepancies in aid for poor students

ANDREW LAWSON

A well-intentioned program designed to make wealthy universities more attractive options for lower-income students has gone disastrously awry.

The New York Times recently collected a large amount of government data on aid allocations and published a comprehensive report by Greg Winter this week, "Rich Colleges Receiving Richest Share of U.S. Aid."

Essentially, the problem dates back to the 1970s. Aid distribution was not formulaic – rather, it depended on assessment by "expert" panels. The predictable result was prestigious universities like Harvard, Yale and Princeton tended to be more "persuasive," especially when their graduates served on the panels.

"If a school was politically savvy and well-connected enough, they would end up with the lion's share of the funds," Ken Redd, research director at the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, explained in the Times article.

In 1980, Congress finally made an attempt to create a fair formula, but it dropped the ball when it applied this condition only to new aid distributions. Since aid amounts have grown relatively little since, the disparities still exist. In fact, the government estimates 60 percent of aid still follows the old patterns of distribution.

So, what's the big deal? After all, Ivy League universities have tuition costs as much as four times higher than state schools like K-State. Obviously, a lower-income student would need four times as much money to attend a college like Harvard.

The issue again comes back to prestige. Other expensive private colleges that are not quite as highly regarded, like Seton Hall University, also receive much less aid than the select and lucky few. Some of these less prestigious universities have even higher tuition costs.

Furthermore, if the intent was for more disadvantaged students to go Stanford or Brown, generally has failed. These universities still have many fewer students than most of the schools receiving less average aid.

Like all bureaucratically-based oversights, no one is really defending this policy, not even the beneficiaries. As Sally Donahue, Harvard's director of financial aid, put it, "How could we complain, really? We have been very fortunate to receive the money that we have."

If no one is defending these discrepancies, why do they still exist? My guess is, the "haves" have made no effort, and neither have their alumni, who have gone on to fill a significant amount of bureaucratic positions.

As for the "have-nots," many of the comments their officials have made indicate a resignation to this state of affairs, and complaints seems to largely have taken the form of grumbling, although financial aid officers are finally beginning to call for reform.

Still, if change is to be made, there needs to be a more concerted and unified effort on the part of the disenfranchised schools.

Such an effort can take a page out of the book of the universities that are trying to bring the Bowl Championship Series system in college football. As with financial aid, a select number of schools are gathering in the largest amount of money from an external source, television contracts.

Basically, they need to be more vocal, and others need to be more vocal on their behalf. This includes prominent alumni, the lower-income students themselves and, most especially, the media.

Greg Winter's article is one step in the right direction. Hopefully, this column is as well.

Show me the money

What kind of disparities did the New York Times uncover, and how bad are they? Here are some examples:

■ Universities receive money for every student who merely applies for financial aid. How do they stack up?

Wisconsin	21 cents
300+ colleges	less than $3
median	$14.38
Brown	$169.23
Dartmouth	$174.88
Stanford	$211.80

■ Colleges also receive additional money for each student that obtains a Pell Grant, usually an amount of a few cents for every Pell dollar that students get. Here's a comparison:

50+ colleges	1 cent
City Univ. of New York*	4 cents
median	7 cents
Harvard	98 cents
MIT	$1.09
Princeton	$1.42

*In 2000, this school had the single-largest number of financial aid applicants in the entire United States.

■ Finally, schools receive aid on a per-student basis to help pay work-study wages. This is how they stack up:

almost 100 colleges	less than $20
median	$87.67
Yale	$595.75
Duke	$600.28
Columbia	$677.93

Beware the danger of news media's power

TAMMY JO OSBORN

Rupert Murdoch can purchase your mind without you knowing, if you let him.

The media mogul owns more than half the news media outlets in Australia, has his hand all over the United States, plays around in the United Kingdom and just recently set out to purchase the soul of Russia. Sounds pretty fishy to me.

Native Australians Murdoch and fellow media tycoon Kerry Packer own a majority of Australian media outlets. Murdoch's blatant support for the war in Iraq has led to bias in material not only in American media, but also in Australian papers. Who knew a nation could be drawn into war by one man?

As chairman and CEO of News Corporation and current owner of the Los Angeles Dodgers, this man is worth $5.3 billion. In the United States, he is influencing what Harper Collins prints, Fox broadcasts, the New York Post runs and 20th Century Fox shows.

As of Monday, Murdoch has made his intention clear to purchase part of one of three main television networks in Russia. According to a Russian Journal article, a report from the New York Times claimed, "Mr. Murdoch is seen as someone comfortable doing business with state-controlled media markets."

In other words, he and government work real well together.

If you don't think media can control how you think, you already are caught in the web.

Remember this the next time you read the paper or listen to the news: what is being said is less important than what is being left out. Reading between and behind the lines is the only way one can escape the invisible influence writers and their employers have on your thinking.

The only way to avoid such manipulation is to draw from a variety of sources and think critically about everything you read from those sources.

Murdoch's success does not mean he is a bad man – in fact, most see him as a model of how to successfully navigate a competitive capitalist system that allows for men and women to reach the heights of their capabilities.

However, it would be frightening if his success did not raise some eyebrows as people peruse channels across the globe, and even more so for a democracy that makes its decisions based upon the knowledge it is fed by the media, especially if that media source is led by a man who likes working with government and striking deals beneficial to both parties.

What is the ultimate danger of this? Barbara Kingsolver's book, "The Poisonwood Bible," casts light on how most of Americans were oblivious to U.S. involvement in Zaire in the 1960s, where our government installed a friendly dictator, Mobutu, in place of a democratically-elected leader.

Many still do not understand America's role in conflicts like that one, nor do they want to. We ignore or are oblivious to blatant U.S. support for violent dictatorships across the world throughout the 1970s and allow ourselves to be fooled into believing Iraq was a war for humanity.

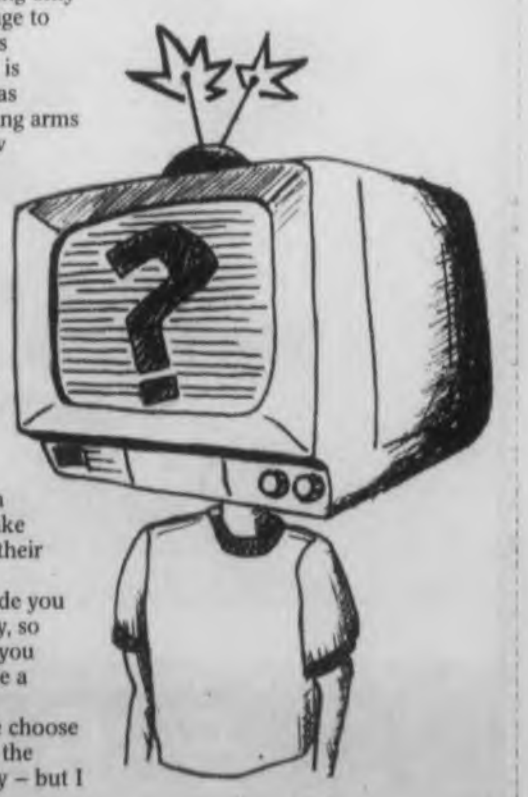
Why?

That is what we are fed by people who control what goes into our minds.

I have long viewed the world as if I were the center, and the media feeds that view by allotting only small amounts of coverage to international happenings unless the United States is involved. Therefore, I was wrapped in the comforting arms of believing what I know is all there is to know.

What a lie.

Questioning what is around you and what is being told to you is perhaps the most important lesson an individual can learn.



As for Murdoch, let's just say the power he holds over what goes into our minds may be more dangerous than the power held by a man like Mobutu, who can take someone's food but not their soul.

No matter on what side you fall, be sure to know why, so that when looking back you can at least say you made a decision and a choice.

Maybe that is why we choose not to decide – to avoid the guilt of choosing wrongly – but I think that will happen less if we keep our minds open, at all times, even as we occasionally come to think we've got a handle on things.

Of course, this means you should question everything I have said right here. Go ahead – be my guest.

Goal of 10 percent studying abroad attainable, admirable

Editor,

I believe President Wefald's goal of 10 percent will only have positive effects on K-State.

Wefald stated he wanted 10 percent of graduating students to have experience studying abroad. Planning and Analysis predicts 3,350 students will graduate in 2005. Therefore, 10 percent of that number is 335.

Also, according to the aforementioned offices, the average student graduates in 4.7 years. K-State's policy is that you must have 30 hours before you can study abroad.

In other words, 362 students are needed to achieve Wefald's goal of 10 percent.

The Office of International Programs is close to achieving this goal. Currently, there are 76 students abroad this semester and the number going out in spring 2004 is 168 students. Not included in this number are students who go out in the summer or on faculty-led group study programs.

Having spent an entire year abroad myself, it is easy to understand why our numbers are lower in the fall – football. However, these 362 students have unlimited ways of gaining their experience studying abroad.

K-State offers English and language programs at all times of the year and these include semester, summer and yearlong programs, intersession and spring break trips, group studies, volunteer programs and international internships.

Another issue concerns the opinion published the same day that concerns the greek community.

First off, it is very unlikely seven out of 70 members would be studying abroad at one time. According to Greek Affairs, roughly 18 percent of K-State's campus is in a sorority or fraternity. Of the 362 students mentioned above, only 65.25 would be greek.

There are 40 greek organizations on campus, which theoretically reduces the total number of students studying abroad in any given semester to 1.6 students from each greek organization. This is a big difference from seven.

However, if these sororities and fraternities feel this is too big of a number that will greatly affect the future of their existence, there are ways of working around it. Why not replace the greek member studying abroad with an incoming international student?

Why not replace the greek member studying abroad with an incoming international student?

Every international student needs a place to stay and, as we all know, Manhattan does not have a surplus of housing nor do our residence halls.

I'm not asking that the international student be treated as a full member – going to chapter or participating in rituals – but they would be paying the full housing costs just like the member who is abroad.

As our world becomes more globalized, it is increasingly important to be knowledgeable of other cultures and ways of lives besides our own. We do not live in the United States of the World, nor do we want to.

I feel so strongly about acquiring an experience studying abroad that, if it were up to me, I would revamp every major's curriculum so that, in order to graduate, every student would need an international experience.

Letter's cynicism disturbs reader

Editor,

In response to Christopher Hayden's Nov. 11 letter on political satire reflecting societal views, I would first like to state I can see why Hayden made several of his points. The ideas of politicians being identical and one's vote not counting both seem valid, at first.

However, on closer inspection it is easy to see how these views and several others within the article have flaws.

We can begin with the idea of getting political information from Comedy Central. I agree that "The Daily Show" is a quality, even hilarious, show that deserved the Emmy it received, but I'm quite sure that it didn't win for excellence in broadcasting journalism.

The show's base is to make the viewers laugh. Under this basis, the show takes snippets of speaking mistakes and other sound bites out of context to get those laughs. The show is not meant to be a serious journalistic venue. That is why no true politician pays attention to it.

If you want a legitimate political news program, watch CNN, Headline News or even Fox News. Yes, they aren't as funny as "The Daily Show," but you will get more of the story. When you take the time to watch one of these stations, you might be able to begin to see the difference between the candidates.

Watch a simple debate or any other political show on one of these networks, and you'll see the candidates have different views. Fiscal policy, foreign policy, and government size and influence all are issues when you talk about the various candidates. Not all of these issues get air time on "The Daily Show."

Why? Because interest rates and unemployment just don't seem to be as humorous as the plight of caribou in Alaska. The fact of the matter is, there have to be differences between the candidates – otherwise, you wouldn't have different parties.

Thus, because we have different parties with different views, you do need to vote, and every vote does count. Hayden's claim that no one's vote counts is the most disturbing of all his points. I'm sorry, but I don't, as I'm sure most don't, buy that no matter who you vote for, you get the same person.

I'm also surprised he only mentions two parties. If he has such a problem with the Democratic and Republican parties, why not vote for a third party? Hayden can't honestly tell me he places the Green and Independent parties in the same boat as the other two.

While I concede that these two parties don't have a chance of winning the election, there is a hope for them in future elections.

If their candidates receive a certain percentage of the vote, the federal government gives that party funds for the next election. Not to mention, then the candidate will be allowed to participate in nationally televised debates.

In the end, there is no "maybe" about it – everyone's vote does count. The importance of a person's vote is not just to elect a president. It is also to make it so the smaller parties' viewpoints can be heard. With the closeness of the last election, I believe it is even more important for a person to vote.

I don't feel the 2004 election will be a fiasco. As for the statement "we are living in a fascist state," I hope this was only thrown in for shock value. Therefore, it barely deserves mentioning, much less a response.

Hayden is right. He doesn't have to move, but it would be nice if he did more than just complain about our political system.

It is easy to criticize. It is a lot harder for a person to actually make a difference and fight for what one believes – that takes effort.

Catholic Church shows progressive nature by acknowledging gay lifestyle

Staff editorial
THE DAILY FREE PRESS
BOSTON UNIVERSITY

BOSTON - As both the Massachusetts state legislature and Supreme Judicial Court continue to mull over the idea of legalizing same-sex marriages, Catholic Bishops from across the country are catching significant public relations flak for what some critics call a lack of a definitive stance on the issue.

More religious congregations, including ones that are Unitarian Universalist, Episcopalian and Reform Jewish, have blessed the idea of same-sex unions, making the Catholic Church's historically staid stance on not allowing them to become even more hot-button.

The church has said it would like homosexuals to be a part of the Catholic community, but it emphasized it could not allow same-sex union benefits under their definition of marriage.

Enraged pundits have attacked the church for not making a definitive stance, accusing them of pandering to both sides of the issue and making an ambiguous assessment.

The United States Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington, which includes Boston Archbishop Sean P. O'Malley, has delayed offering a more definitive statement until February, waiting to see how the state legislature and judiciary rule on the matter.

But aren't these many critics of the church's ambiguity missing a much bigger point in calling for a more definitive statement?

The Catholic Church, no stranger to the scrutiny of progressive reform advocates or gay rights organizations, is showing signs of being more progressive on the issue of homosexuality than it ever has.

A literal interpretation of the Bible and Catholic beliefs perfectly justifies the Church attacking homosexuality as a whole -- it is fully within their jurisdiction to do so and homosexuality is frowned upon according to the Catholic belief system.

But the fact that the church is now being asked to make a more definitive statement instead of being blasted for the same, absolutely definitive, anti-homosexuality stance it has always carried is a clear sign of progressive thinking.

The Catholic Church, by and large, is willing to address homosexuality without labeling it immoral or classifying it as some sort of unnatural disease.

It is acknowledging that homosexuality does exist as a lifestyle, not a sacrilege, and it makes significant progress on being able to accept someone who is both homosexual and a Catholic.

Progress comes slowly, but in the 21st century, it is being made.

Lady Cats set for Purdue

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It has the excitement and intrigue that barks of Final Four.

It features four teams that could very well end up in New Orleans come March.

It may be the middle of November, but K-State's women's basketball season-opener is more than just another game.

When the No. 5 Wildcats open against No. 7 Purdue at 4 p.m. Sunday in West Lafayette, Ind., 14,123 fans and a national television audience on ESPN2 will see three Naismith Award candidates, two of the top coaches in college basketball, and one preseason All-American.

And all of that will come directly after No. 3 Duke plays No. 4 Texas in the 1:30 p.m. opener of the State Farm Tipoff Classic.

"It's exciting to see Kansas State achieving this level of recognition and esteem," Coach Deb Patterson said. "It's very special and a tribute to our coaching staff and players who have paved the path."

None of those players have been more important than Nicole Ohlde, the senior from Clay Center, Kan., who came to K-State four years ago and summarily put the program on her shoulders.

"When Nicole chose to Kansas State, it was with the idea of being a difference-maker," Patterson said. "It just puts a huge stamp on what a difference-maker is."

And four years later, Ohlde is set to put an even bigger mark on K-State history. With eight points, she will break Diana Miller's career scoring record.

"How appropriate would it be to go into a game like the one we're about to play and achieve that milestone?" Patterson asked. "She's been an absolutely phenomenal factor in the evolution of this program.

Eight points doesn't sound like much, but against Purdue it may be a tall order. The Boilermakers return eight of their top nine scorers from a team that reached the NCAA's Elite Eight a year ago, winning its eighth-straight Big 10 tournament or regular season title in the process.

Purdue is led by senior forward Shereka Wright, a 5-foot-10 All-American who has averaged 19 points per game each of the last two seasons.

"We know they're a great team – made it to the Elite Eight last year, so that's saying a lot," guard Laurie Koehn said. "Shereka Wright is a great player, but they have a lot of great players."

Another of them is Erika Valek, a 5-foot-6 guard who earned first-team All-Big 10 honors last season by averaging 14 points and five assists per game. The pin-point three-point shooter has started every game she has played – 98 times in the last three seasons.

While K-State is expected to start its returning lineup from last season, at some point several freshmen will see floor time.

Three of them – Twiggy McIntyre, Claire Coggins and Shanda Murdoch – saw extensive playing time in K-State's 103-47 win over Sparta Praha, a Czech club team, on Sunday night.

The intimidation of a packed Mackey Arena, a top-10 opponent and their first regular-season game isn't getting to the newcomers, though.

Coggins said the excitement is overriding the anxiety.

"Well, I'm going to smile when I come out and see them," she said. "Us freshmen need to just come in and be disciplined and not let anything bother us.

"It's going to be tight, though, 14,000 fans."

Emotions high in preparation of Nebraska game

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It used to be the focal point of the entire year.

Fans circled the calendar and the purple prayed for a victory. Journalists chronicled how long it had been since the Cats beat the Huskers, and Bill Snyder and crew labored to bring an end to the streak.

In 1998, the Collegian's "Gameday" section counted the days from the first kick-off to the annual clash with Nebraska.

And then K-State won that season. And again in a snowy classic in 2000. And again, most convincingly, in a 49-13 whitewashing in 2002.

But even after three wins in the last five years, nothing has changed. K-State versus Nebraska is still the biggest game of the year.

Bill Snyder doesn't just come out and say it, though.

No matter the opponent, week-in and week-out he argues the next game is the most important one of the season.

"We try to make each game that we play the most important one," Snyder said. "This game is no different. But..."

Even Snyder can't deny Saturday's implications. Facing the No. 15 Cornhuskers, fighting to win the Big 12 North title for just the third time, struggling to end a 35-year losing streak in Lincoln – yeah, it's enough to get players excited this week.

"With Nebraska being tremendously talented and the storied program that it is, I'm sure it highlights the emotions of the players and coaches," Snyder said.

Snyder's right. The emotions of his players are highlighted.

A win could open the door to a K-State-Oklahoma showdown in Kansas City, Mo., for the Big 12 title. It could help send the Cats to their first ever BCS bowl.

Nebraska's vaunted running game meets K-State's stonewall defense

It is hard to discount the similarities.

Nebraska ranks first in the Big 12 in rushing. K-State ranks third. Both teams are led by dual-threat quarterbacks. Both teams have defenses among the nation's best. Both have everything to gain – and much to lose.

"Big 12 bragging rights are on the line," defensive end Andrew Shull said. "We'll have to play our best game to have a chance."

To have a chance at the Big 12 North, winning in Lincoln on Saturday is paramount – for both teams.

For K-State, doing that means stopping the Nebraska ground game, which historically hasn't been easy. The Huskers have topped 200 yards rushing in 30 of the last 34 meetings.

Josh Davis has been the incumbent as Nebraska's famed I-back, and David Horne has spelled him through much of the season.

But in a 24-3 win last week against Kansas, the emergence of sophomore Cory Ross was enough to worry Coach Bill Snyder – and was enough to earn Ross the starting job. He gained 108 yards on just 19 carries, all in the second half.

"He's an awfully good player," Snyder said of the 5-foot-6 running back. "He's just one of those little guys that, with a big offensive line, makes him hard to find sometimes."

In fact, comparisons are already being made to 5-foot-7 Darren Sproles, K-State's record-setting running back.

Cats to play host to Nebraska to determine Big 12's top team

For five of the past six seasons, the Nebraska Volleyball team has been crowned Big 12 champions.

Now, they find themselves in second place to 5th-ranked K-State (24-3, 14-1) as the two teams face off for Big 12 supremacy at 7 p.m. Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

Coach Suzie Fritz knows the significance of the matchup, and that the Huskers aren't an easy team to face.

"It's a pretty big match," Fritz said. "Unless the wheels would come off either team, it's probably a matchup of the top two teams in the conference."

After handing Nebraska (23-3, 14-2) a 3-2 loss on Oct. 11 in Lincoln, the Huskers fell to Missouri, 3-2, at home four days later.

But, Fritz said, they have bounced back since the two teams last faced off. The Huskers having won eight straight.

"They've kind of found their rhythm a little bit. They seem to be playing pretty well and gotten some significant wins over the last couple of weeks," Fritz said.

"It's a pretty big match in terms of conference ranks."

Eastwood adaptation

'Mystic River' follows novel's plot closely

"Mystic River"
Movie review by Jacob Walker

I had mixed emotions when I went to see "Mystic River," Clint Eastwood's latest directorial undertaking. I was excited to see Tim Robbins, Sean Penn and Kevin Bacon – all awesome actors – but I dreaded to see what would happen to the complex plot of Dennis Lehane's excellent book from which the movie was adapted.

All too often, Hollywood axes the tough parts, or uses unnatural dialog instead of the significant body language described in its literary counterpart.

Not so in "Mystic River." The movie follows the book more faithfully than any I can remember seeing. While maintaining the mysteriousness of the plot, the character motivations, even the minute details such as body language and word emphasis are all given seemingly special care and attention.

And that's just the beginning. Sean Penn gives an astoundingly deep and moving performance, truly bringing every aspect of his enormously complex character to life.

Tim Robbins and Kevin Bacon tie for a close second, both playing their characters with surprising depth.

The supporting actors, including Laurence Fishburne, Marcia Gay Harden and Laura Linney, all give their own spectacular performances.

The acting is really the main feature in this film, the only thing that adds more to the audiences' experience is the masterfully suspenseful plot itself. Clint Eastwood showed wonderful restraint, sticking to the film's guns rather than adding some sort of excuse for an explosion or car chase.

The one sour moment in the movie takes place at the very beginning, when the three main characters were playing together as children, before going their separate ways as adults. Although the young actors seemed to fit the description department, they couldn't seem to get their act straight.

Though I imagine it is difficult to find high quality young actors who fit the part, I wish that casting had picked three children who had better chemistry with each other.

Aside from that unfortunate opener, the film carries itself with a great deal of pride, despite its less than ritzy setting.

Though the length may daunt the impatient – who might want to just wait for it to get to Blockbuster – the film is worth it.

Pop star Mandy Moore matures through singing, rather than stripping

"Coverage"
Album review by Matthew Webber

Courtesy art

Like all other teenage pop star/actresses, Mandy Moore wants to grow up. So, on her new album, "Coverage," she sings songs she didn't write.

This, of course, is no different from her younger albums, but the gimmick here is these songs are written by Elton John, Joni Mitchell, Carole King, Cat Stevens, Blondie, Todd Rundgren and other artists who were popular before Moore was alive.

Every song on "Coverage" is a cover. So every song is an improvement on earlier Moore-sung slop like "Candy."

Moore recruited producer John Fields to record the album in his garage, wanting to rock out from the comfort of suburbia. Her garage band of seasoned studio pros plays all the right notes in all the right places, playing-by-numbers as precisely as computers.

Moore rocks out as much as she is able, limited only by her serviceable but not spectacular voice, her lack of credibility as an artist and her reverence for the originals.

The sweetest songs on the album – "The Whole of the Moon," "Drop the Pilot" and "Have a Little Faith in Me" – are impossible to screw up. Moore, like your one friend who takes karaoke entirely too seriously, doesn't even try to tamper with them.

"Coverage" is the album the cast of "American Idol" would have made in 1981. It is as much of a product – as opposed to a work of art – as anything she has recorded. As Guns 'N Roses had their "Spaghetti Incident," "Coverage" is Moore's "Bell-Bottom-Era Affair."

But "Coverage" is catchy. It's so slick it sticks in my head. It includes songs by originals, so how can it not be anything but classic?

As a singer and an actress, Moore is little more than mediocre. But as a compiler of mix tapes, she's a genius! If "Coverage" inspires any of her age cohorts to seek out the original albums on which these songs appeared, she'll become more useful than Jessica Simpson.

Authentic or not, Moore sings good songs. Some days, that's all I want from a pop star.

I can't begrudge Moore for singing songs she likes. If she wants to interpret the classics, so be it. At least she wants to grow up by singing instead of stripping.

Digital film restoration revives once-lost classic cinematic gems

DIVERSIONS

A weekly column on music, movies and all things related to pop culture.

Film is a powerful and captivating medium for art, emotion and belief. It also is in desperate need of preservation.

CHRIS HARROP

Now that movies are shown with digital projectors and DVDs, it is easy to forget that real film – celluloid – is vulnerable to scratches, dust, mold and aging. Ironically, those digital technologies are the best hopes of preserving many of the silver screen's finest products.

A world of cinema is re-emerging, as more and more organizations work to restore and preserve classic films. A 1993 Library of Congress report warned of the loss of films due to neglect, as fewer than 20 percent of the films produced during the 1920s still exist today. That statistic is changing slowly. Not only are classic and historical films being found and restored, but they also are being made available to the general public for the first time in decades. Companies such as Kino International and French independent film company MK2 recently digitally restored "Modern Times," quite simply the finest film Charlie Chaplin ever made.

Other classics, including Federico Fellini's early classic "I Vitelloni" and the sci-fi epic "Metropolis," are being restored onto new 35 mm prints and going back into commercial release in many areas.

With so much digital restoration and preservation archiving occurring, companies such as the Criterion Collection are finding more films to add to their illustrious pantheon. Similar to the restoration efforts, Criterion also is dedicated to presenting many of the finest films ever created in the highest quality transfers of picture and sound to DVD.

While the film restoration and preservation movement is probably the most important byproduct of the digital revolution, it is not without problems. Many modern directors – including George Lucas and Steven Spielberg – have taken the technology available as license to edit away on their early classics such as "Star Wars" and "E.T. The Extra-Terrestrial."

There is a fine line between film restoration and film revision, and directors such as Lucas clearly cross over that line. While some of the clamor about Lucas' revisions to his classic "Star Wars" trilogy is due to the unusually large and vocal fan base, it still goes to show that not even the directors should tamper with their classics.

For a young generation whose major cinematic influences are M. Night Shyamalan and Steven Spielberg, we now have the opportunity to see the classics that influenced them with a quality and clarity that has not been seen heretofore.

Theft protection a must during holiday

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the holiday season abound, people are getting into the giving mood. Malls and shopping centers will soon be bustling with people finding that perfect gift.

Thieves and pickpockets are stalking unsuspecting shoppers.

Shoppers can protect themselves from such miscreants, though.

Common sense can go a long way in keeping personal belongings safe, said Sgt. Troy Hensley, of the Riley County Police Department.

"One of the problems we have is people leave their purse in their cart and walk away," he said. "When they come back, the purse is gone. Don't leave your purse unattended in your car, either. Leaving something unattended is an open invite for someone else to take it."

Mike Gee, head of security for Manhattan Town Center, said the mall takes extra precautions during the holiday season.

"I do increase the number of officers during the holidays," he said. "Because mall hours are extended, our hours are extended, so we bring in additional officers to patrol as well."

If a thief is going to pickpocket someone, they might target a person with baggy clothes, Hensley said.

"If you wear tighter fitting clothes, you'll feel the sensation of someone trying to take something from you," he said. "Pulling a huge wad of cash out of your purse or wallet to pay for a three dollar Big Mac is also not a good idea, because it just draws unnecessary attention to you."

To prevent being mugged, shoppers should park in a well-lit area, Hensley said.

"If you are able to park away from other cars, that prevents someone from being able to hide between them," he said. "Glance under your car as you're walking up to it and look in the back seat when you're unlocking it. If you're alone, you're more of a target – there is safety in numbers."

Shoppers shouldn't overload themselves with packages, either, Gee said.

"You are opening yourself up if you're walking out with armload of products," he said. "Don't be afraid to ask one of the security guards to escort you – they will do it. All of our officers are off-duty police officers."

The security officers patrol the common areas of the mall and the areas adjacent, Gee said.

"The parking lot is city property, so the police department patrols that," he said.

If someone is being mugged, they should not try to be a hero, Hensley said.

"Property is property – physical injury is another matter," he said. "Physical property can be replaced. If they are telling you to give them all your money, you can go and earn another $100, but being rushed to the hospital with an injury is not worth $100."

If a customer suspects anything suspicious at the mall, they should report it to security immediately, Gee said.

"If there is anything in our center that is uncomfortable and they let us know, we will investigate," he said. "We are pretty strict, and we don't allow a lot of things. If its offensive to me, I won't allow it."

If personal belongings are stolen, people should contact the police department, their credit card companies and their bank, Hensley said.

"If you know what the number was of the last check you wrote, they can put a stop payment on the rest of them," he said

However, cash cannot be recovered, Hensley said.

"It's not a great idea to carry large amounts of cash, unless you're going to carry it in different locations," he said. "There is virtually no way to recover stolen cash, so a thief can bilk you out of two, three or four hundred dollars, but if have checks or credit cards, you can put stop payments on them or cancel them."

How to Protect yourself and your belongings

- Don't leave your belongings unattended.
- Don't carry large amounts of cash with you.
- Park in well-lit areas.
- Don't overload yourself with packages.
- Report suspicious behavior.

Speaker to promote agricultural communications

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thirty-seven thousand Kansas children were affected in 2002.

The Kansas Foundation for Agriculture in the Classroom aims to educate students on agriculture's importance.

The foundation had more than 195 donors last year. Of 2003 donors, Frontier Farm Credit Services, High Plains Publishing and the High Plains Journal are sponsoring a motivational speech by farmer Trent Loos in recognition of the foundation's 20-year anniversary.

Loos is a sixth generation farmer who has a background in livestock production.

Barbara Oplinger, administrator for KFAC and agriculture producer, said the purpose of Loos' speech is to promote communications between consumers and farmers.

"Most consumers have paradigms or misunderstandings about the farmer," she said. "Trent's speech will help the farmer become braver in communicating with the consumer."

Oplinger said she hasn't heard Loos speak, but she subscribes to his e-mails and listens to all of his radio shows.

"He has spoken in Kansas City, Kan., but I didn't get to hear him. I've heard he is very dynamic. Other people have told me that he will make you want to get up out of your seat and help to promote agriculture," she said.

KFAC is a non-profit educational foundation and they raise their own funds. Oplinger said with other funds the foundation sponsors an educators guide, a kids magazine, a postcard contest for students in K-6 and an assembly titled, "Communicating Kansas Kids, Crops and Critters."

Sarah Lind, senior in agricultural communications and journalism, said she looks forward to Loos' speech because of his experience.

"I look forward to hearing an informed speaker addressing agricultural issues. He is involved with the industry and promotes change within the industry," she said.

Military science program ranks 1st in region

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Eight ROTC senior cadets from K-State have been recognized from a national board as Distinguished Military Graduates.

The honor is a national distinction to recognize the best cadets in the nation, said Lt. Col. Arthur Degroat, head of the military science department.

"There's a national board that meets in Washington every year, so it's an independent selection," he said. "What the board is looking for is the whole person concept – not just military proficiency."

DeGroat said the board also looks at academic standing, service contribution to the university and the community, in addition to physical fitness and performance ranking in all army and military training.

"Academic, fitness and leadership are the top three," he said. "And is K-State a good place to do all of these things? Absolutely. Our students have access to all state of the art opportunities and they take advantage of them."

Generally, the top 20 percent of all cadets from the 270 Army ROTC colleges around the nation are selected as Distinguished Military Graduates. This year, DeGroat said the board selected a total of 4, 685.

For K-State, it's the first time the university has had eight cadets selected for the honor – a total of 44 percent of the graduating class.

As a result, K-State is now placed at the highest in the eight-state region, which includes 20 colleges and universities that have the Army ROTC programs.

"I've been to the National ROTC Commander Conference and there are many schools that have no one selected," DeGroat said. "It's very unique that we're producing such a large number of the best cadets in the nation."

Mark Peer, senior in secondary education, was one of the eight students selected as a Distinguished Military Graduate.

After turning down a football offer to play for the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in New York, Peer decided to come to K-State and join the military science program.

"My mom graduated from K-State. I liked the college, I liked the people and I knew I wanted to do something with the military," he said.

Peer said from the time he was little, he knew he wanted to do something with the Army. He didn't know, however, the experience and honor he would be receiving.

"I'm hoping to make the Army a career," he said. "I don't know what branch I'll be in, but I'll make the Army a career."

Fellow recipient Courtney Townsend, senior in elementary education, didn't have the same military interest growing up.

In fact, Townsend, a military brat, said she didn't want anything to do with the military until she joined the National Guard her senior year in high school.

"I decided it was a nice balance," she said. "I could join the military culture but also have contact with civilians and experience different things and open my mind up to different things."

Now Townsend said she will be commissioned as an officer in May, receive her teaching certificate, and then she plans on going to officer basic course.

The award, she said, signifies her hard work over the past four years at K-State.

"I feel honored," Townsend said. "I feel like I worked hard for it and I'm glad that it was recognized."

Wonder Workshop starts fund raiser

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After its main fund raiser fell through, the Wonder Workshop is bouncing back with alternative plans.

It is having a barbecue from 3 to 7 tonight and a plant sale from 8 a.m. to noon Saturday.

Amid the workshop's busiest days for their annual haunted house fund-raiser, it was closed due to lack of a sprinkler system, a violation of state statute.

Richard Pitts, director of the Wonder Workshop, said that after the house closed, volunteers had several worries.

The dinner fund-raiser was an idea from the volunteers, Pitts said. The plant sale, however, was added after two truckloads of plants were given to the workshop by an anonymous donor.

Pitts said food for the barbecue was donated by Ad Astra Coffee Shop, Cox Bros. BBQ and Little Apple Brewery.

"I hope we have enough food, but hopefully we can earn plenty of money to pay the bills," Pitts said.

German Mennonite Church gears up for Sunday meal, bake sale

By Melissa Haug
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Mennonite Church will have its 17th annual German Mennonite meal and bake sale this Sunday.

"Individuals come to the craft sale in hopes of buying Christmas gifts. There is a good variety of items for individuals to choose from, and the best part is the fact that they're all hand-crafted, good quality items," said Bob Atchison, fund-raiser coordinator and member of the church.

The meal will consist of borscht, a chicken and vegetable soup, along with whole hog sausage from Peabody, Kan., and a New Year's cookie.

Money raised will benefit the congregation, but this year $500 will be given to the Christian Peacemaker Teams, an organization providing non-violent intervention throughout the world by standing between various groups of conflict.

Wichita launches campaign to lift city's image after turmoil

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA, Kan. – Wichita, which has struggled with job losses during the economic downturn and more recently with controversy in city government, is about to accentuate the positives with a new local advertising campaign.

The campaign – built around the slogan "Wichita: Great companies, great people!" – will highlight economic development and quality of life, Jessica Johnson, city marketing director, said.

Ads will begin appearing on billboards and in newspapers, as well as wrapped around at least one city bus, hopefully by Thanksgiving.

The campaign comes on the heels of City Hall upheaval that culminated last week with the resignation of longtime City Manager Chris Cherches.

The campaign was initiated by Mayor Carlos Mayans, who took office in April. He has worked out a deal for free billboard space with BKO Outdoor Advertising, a new entrant into the Wichita market.

"They are going to do the sign like a banner so it's reusable," Mayans said. "Whenever they have a blank billboard, they'll put it up. Then, they will take it down when they have a paying customer."

Pat Kelso, a partner in the billboard company, said he sees it as "part of our responsibility to the community."

CLASSY | Cats battle to stay in top 8 schools in dance competition

They hope to get into the top eight, which is quite reasonable bet after they placed third in the tape competition last time.

"If we place in the top eight, we will get a hotel room paid, which is a big plus," said the squad's captain Kira Epler, senior in chemical engineering.

Classy Cats got free accommodation and free admission to the national championship in the last two years. Whether they will enjoy one of the best Orlando's hotels for free again will be known by the beginning of January, Libby Towner, sophomore in education, said.

With less than a week left till video recording, there is not much time left for studying, so girls work on their class assignments in short breaks between routines. Open books and pencils are scattered on the floor among bottles with water, clothes and sneakers.

The team features girls with various majors – from apparel design and education to chemical engineering and architecture, but there is not a single dance major on the team.

"We all have pretty high GPAs. Most of us are used to being busy, so we just make time to do things we need to do," Jessica Murphy, freshman in education, said.

What does it mean for Classy Cats to be classy?

"I think being classy means being a good role model. We have a lot of fans – little girls who want to be just like us. That's one thing I keep in mind," Towner said.

Kira Epler, who has been on the team for three years and for whom this season is the last one, said the womens are very conscious of their roles as K-State representatives.

"We are doing what nobody else takes time to do. We practice 12 extra hours a week. We have a team GPA that we are shooting for," she said. "We are trying to be good not only in dancing, but in anything we are doing. That's how we promote being classy."

At the same time, Epler said people need to remember that Classy Cats are just college students.

"When you get here in your freshman year, and you've never been away from home before, there are many new choices you have to make," she said.

"I think people tend to judge us harsher for doing exact the same thing that everybody else does."

Many womens said they do not pay attention to such jokes and try to concentrate on doing their best.

"I think it comes with territory of being a representative and being in front of everybody. And it also comes from the lack of understanding of what it takes to do that," Epler said.

Kasey Huffman, freshman in apparel design, said the women are classy in that they are responsible and moral.

"Sometimes our dance moves are interpreted wrong by people who don't know the art of dance. But when you look at that an art form, we are not being seductive or slutty – that's just the way that dancers are," Huffman said.

FOOTBALL | Cornhuskers game could make or break entire season

It could snap an embarrassingly long losing streak. Televised on ABC, it could be a chance for K-State to redeem itself in the eyes of the nation.

In a campaign that began with such high hopes but realized such painful downfalls, a win in Lincoln could save the season.

"Your emotions and your and excitement for the game will increase," junior wide receiver Antoine Polite said. "You're playing an ABC 2:30 game against Nebraska in your conference. You know it's a huge game."

A tribute to concrete monstrosities everywhere, Nebraska's Memorial Stadium will pack nearly 74,000. Almost everyone will be decked in red, screaming and rooting for a Husker victory.

It's an awe-inspiring atmosphere, Polite said. Walking out on the field, the fans all around, shattering all concentration, and then spreading upwards into the second deck, where only more red awaits, letting loose eardrum pulverizing waves of cheers and jeers.

It's an all-encompassing atmosphere that, for 17 straight games, has swallowed K-State's best teams. Chad May couldn't do it. K-State played close in 1993, but lost 45-28. Michael Bishop couldn't do it, either. In 1997, his Cats fell 56-26.

However, the key to Saturday's game doesn't lie in mulling over the magnitude, Polite said.

If K-State is to realize its goals, snap the streak, stay alive in the Big 12 hunt and impress the nation, perhaps Snyder is right. Maybe it should just be another week.

"We've played on some big stages. It's about going up there and getting that crowd quiet, making big plays and putting points on the board," Polite said.

"Even though it's a bigger game, it doesn't change our mentality. We're still going to take it one game at a time. It's just a bigger game at a bigger level."

There isn't much more that could add to Saturday's match up. Two ranked teams, a budding rivalry, trash talk and a long home winning streak stands to be broken.

For K-State, it's the game of the year.

"This is huge. This is huge for everyone that has played at K-State, and for everyone that will play at K-State," senior captain Andrew Shull said. "It's a huge game and we realize that. We're just going to take it a day at a time not, get wrapped up in all the hype."

DEFENSE | Similarities abound between Nebraska, K-State players

"I know Nebraska feels that way, that he's very much like Darren," Snyder said. "I would trust their judgment in that respect."

But in talking about Ross, Davis and Horne, Snyder and K-State are leaving out the Huskers' top ground threat: Jammal Lord.

The Nebraska quarterback has 713 yards and nine touchdowns on the ground, running an option offense geared toward making the trigger-man an extra running back.

"They have more option schemes than we have," Snyder said. "Outside of that, I think it's very similar."

Telling K-State quarterback Ell Roberson that he's similar to Lord wouldn't be wise, though. Roberson called that comparison more than inaccurate.

"He's just a competitor who likes to use his mouth and talk a whole lot," Roberson said. "For all that stuff he talks, I haven't seen him back it up yet."

Lord isn't a great threat through the air, though. He's only thrown for 90 yards per game this season, and Nebraska's passing attack ranks 115th in the nation.

Shull said that is just fine.

"Me, personally, I love a team that runs the ball," he said. "I don't like a team that throws. They're going to try to run the ball and shove it down your throat. It's going to be a fun game."

And numberwise, that should play into K-State's favor. The Wildcat rush defense ranks second in the Big 12 and 15th in the nation, allowing less than 100 yards per game.

That dominance has been more evident in recent weeks. K-State's four-game winning streak has been fueled by stout defensive efforts, leading Snyder to believe the defense is playing its best this season.

"I think that would be a fair assessment," he said. "I wouldn't argue with you right now."

The Cats have outscored their last four opponents 174-36, and have been getting even more stingy against the run with each game.

K-State allowed 132 yards rushing to Colorado, 89 to Kansas, 52 to Baylor, and held Iowa State to only 39 yards rushing last weekend.

"We're not doing anything different," Snyder said. "We're just doing what we do better."

VOLLEYBALL | Coach: fan support needed at game against Nebraska

In K-State's 3-2 win over Missouri on Wednesday, Fritz said the play of her seniors – Lauren Goehring, Cari Jensen, Kris Jensen and Laura Downey-Wallace – was the difference in the match.

She expects nothing different from those four Saturday.

"They're part of the reason we're having the year that we're having, and as long as they continue to do the things that they've been doing all year, we'll be just fine," Fritz said.

"Their ability to play consistently under pressure over time has been a big factor in our success, and I don't anticipate that changing."

One thing Fritz would like to see Saturday is a home atmosphere similar to the one Nebraska put forth earlier in the season.

That support, she said, would make it tougher for the Huskers, who are known for their fan support.

"We need to create as difficult of an environment for the opponent as we possibly can on Saturday, because when we go up to Nebraska they have an unbelievable environment," Fritz said.

"We need to get as much purple in here Saturday night as we can."

While fan support is always important, Fritz said that in a match of this caliber, more is always better.

"It's a big deal," Fritz said of fan support. "It's so difficult to play on the road. Not only are you trying to play in a foreign environment, but many of them are somewhat hostile as well, and they're getting after you."

That same foreign environment is what Fritz would like to show the Huskers, adding that the K-State fans have given her squad a boost all season.

"Our fans have been awesome this year in just kind of creating that extra edge, being loud and getting involved in the match and, in my opinion, put us over the top in a couple of those real tight five gamers," Fritz said.

"I think they were the difference."

LAW | Officials hope for monetary support of new drug rehab law

In Riley County, Collins said it costs $55 a day to keep a person in jail. Out-patient treatment may be more affordable, he said, however if the offender were to check into a treatment center, the costs could be much more.

All drug offenders must be treated at a center that is not only certified by the state, but also includes a license from the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services.

"Because they have to be certified, the document made them come to additional trainings," Biggs said.

Kyle Kessler, director of government and media relations for Kansas SRS, said the organization has licensed 200 treatment providers in the state over the past 20 years. Of those, six are licensed treatment organizations in Manhattan.

Funding for the new law has been put in place for one year, with a majority going toward treatment and a portion going to community correctional facilities.

But Biggs hopes this year will be the first – not last – for the new law.

"We're really hoping the funding comes through in future years," she said.

Student dies in accident

3 other students injured en route to football game

Armstrong

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One K-State student was killed and three were seriously injured in a three-vehicle accident Friday evening. One other person was killed and another injured in the same accident.

Kevin Armstrong, junior in economics, was killed instantly while he and three friends were traveling to the K-State football game in Lincoln, Neb.

Also injured in the accident were Evan Riordan, junior in pre-pharmacy, Eric Lovig, junior in biology, and Mollie Delph, sophomore in pre-health. All four students were wearing seat belts.

Delph was air-lifted to the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Kan. with severe head trauma. As of Sunday afternoon, she remained in critical condition in the neuro-intensive care unit with a neck fracture, heavy bruising of her lungs and swelling in her neck and throat.

Lovig and Riordan were taken to Mercy Health Center in Manhattan. Lovig underwent surgery for a dislocated hip and was expected to be released Sunday. Riordan was moved

14th Fort Riley soldier dead after convoy attack

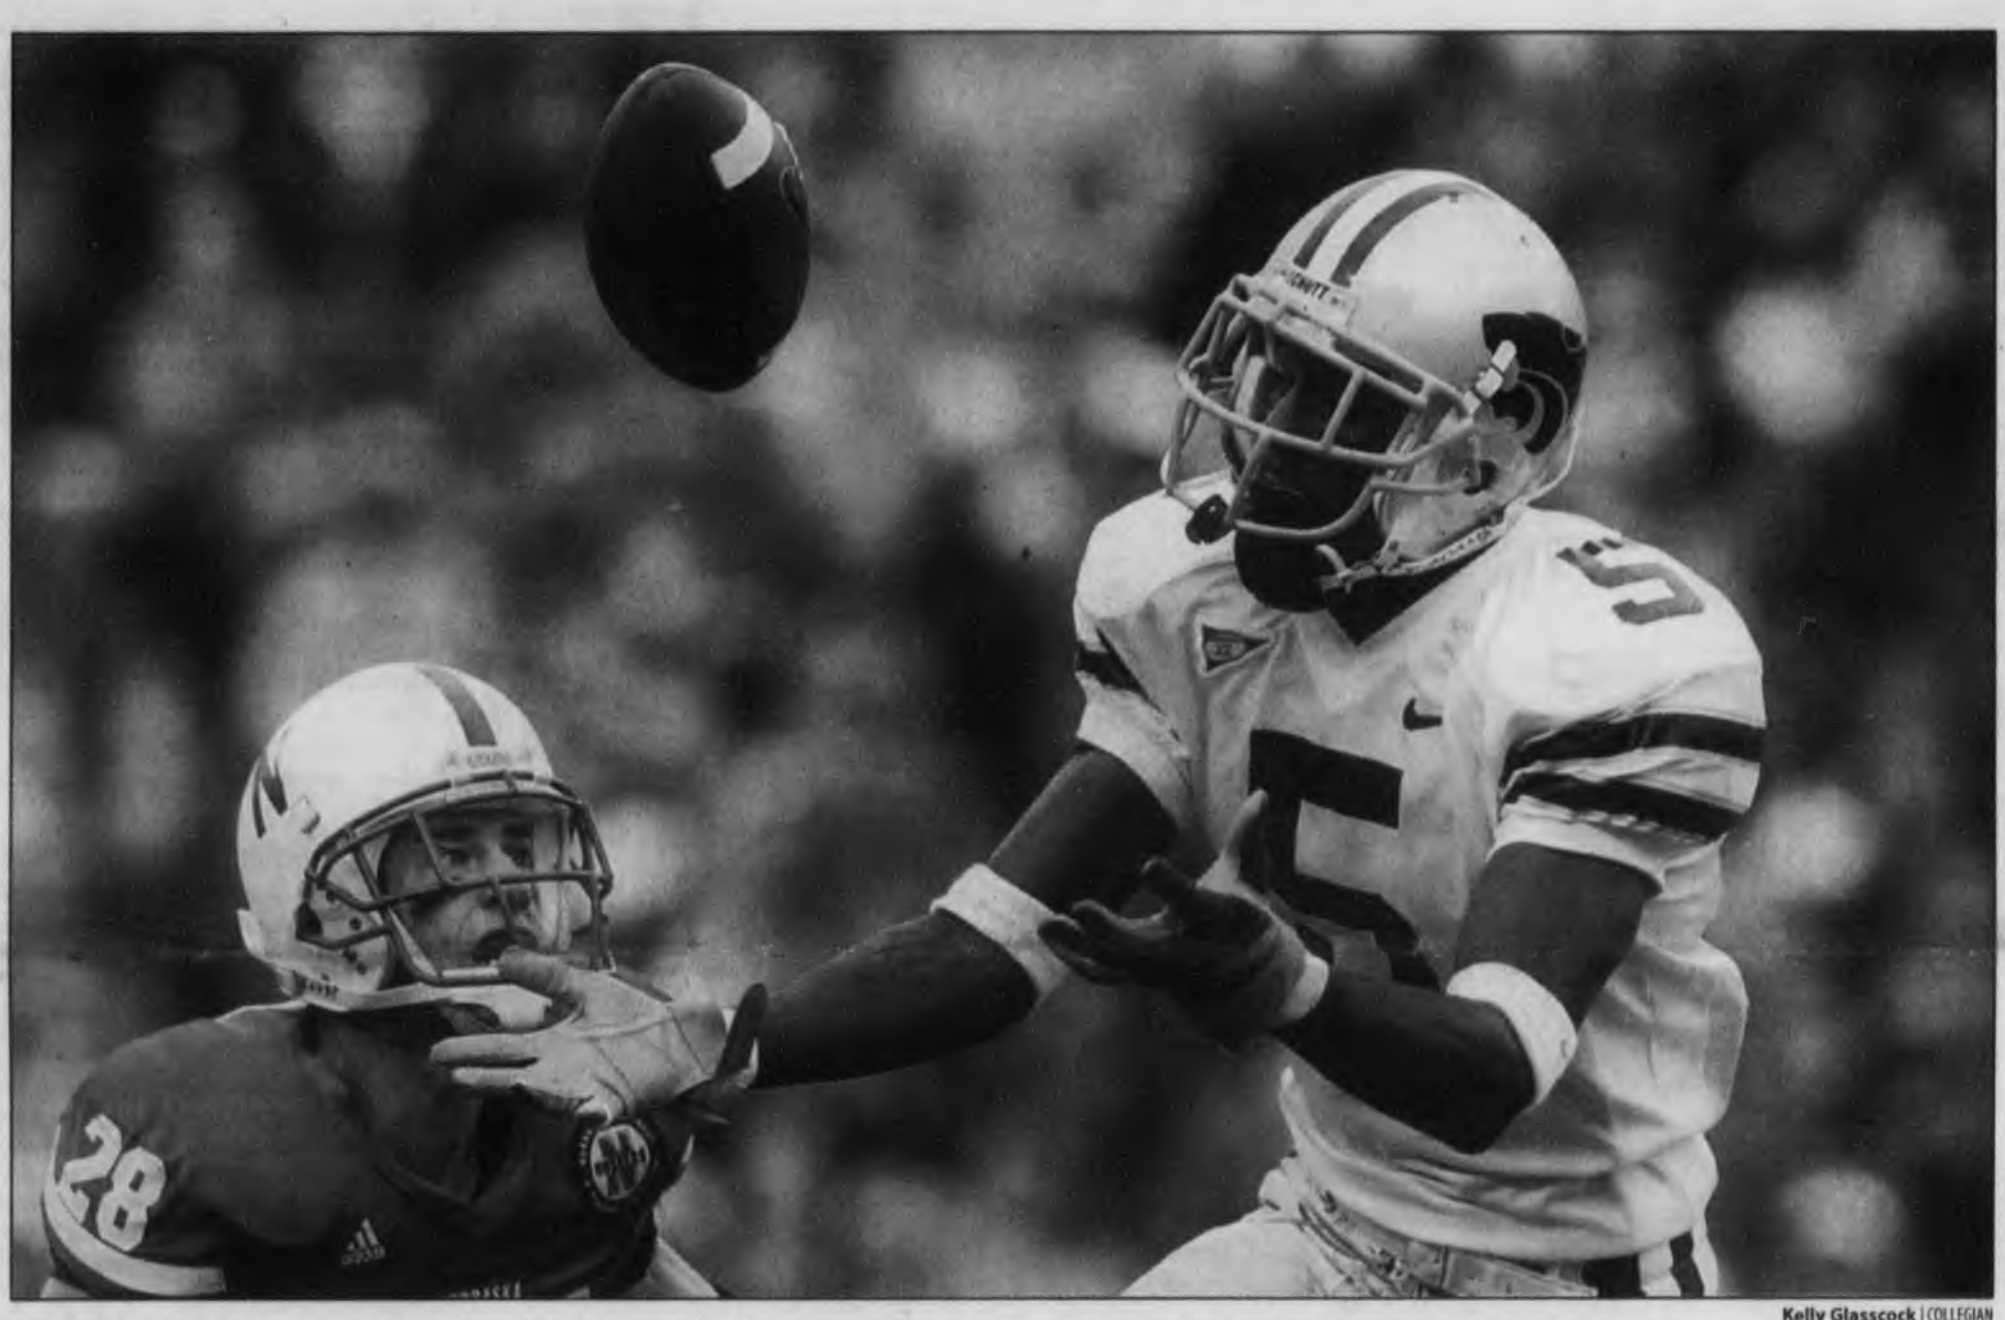
A Fort Riley soldier died Friday in Baghdad, Iraq, the Department of Defense announced.

Spc. Irving Medina, 22, was killed when his wheeled convoy was struck by an improvised explosive device.



Medina is the 14th Fort Riley soldier to be killed during Operation Iraqi Freedom. More than 400 Americans have been killed since the operation began.

Medina was assigned to service battery, 4th Battalion, 1st Field Artillery, 3rd Brigade, 1st Armored Division. He joined the army in September 2001 and deployed to Iraq as a cannon crew member in April 2003.

Seventeen other American soldiers were reported dead Saturday following a collision of Black Hawk helicopters.

Medina was a resident of Middleton, N.Y.

The incident surrounding his death is still under investigation.

Dream comes true for Wildcats

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LINCOLN, Neb. – Eli Roberson said he had a dream – that he hooked up with receiver James Terry on a touchdown pass to beat Nebraska.

Terry, too, had a dream – that he was on the receiving end, helping the Cats win for the first time in Lincoln since 1968.

And maybe dreams do come true.

Roberson and Terry connected on touchdown receptions of 63 and 37 yards, as K-State broke open a 7-7 halftime game to win 38-9 Saturday night before a crowd of 78,014 – the sixth largest in Memorial Stadium history.

The win keeps K-State (9-3, 5-3) alive in the Big 12 North and sets up a divisional title game with Missouri for the right to play Oklahoma in the Big 12 Championship.

But for at least one night, K-State

After trash talk between Nebraska and K-State before and during the game, Eli Roberson was backed by his teammates in the 38-9 win on Saturday. "I told Lord he's a guy that talks a lot of smack," Roberson said. "We just wanted to say K-State's in da' house."

WORLD IN REVIEW: 7 THINGS YOU DIDN'T KNOW 7 DAYS AGO

Fatalities increase in Iraq

Staff and wire reports

Seventeen U.S. soldiers were killed this weekend when two U.S. Black Hawk helicopters crashed in a residential neighborhood in the northern Iraqi city of Mosul.

Five other soldiers also were injured in the Saturday crash. Military officials say they believe one helicopter climbed to avoid gunfire and collided with a second Black Hawk, causing both to crash.

Anja Niedringhaus | The Associated Press
US Army soldiers remove the wreckage of a U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter Sunday after it crashed into a residential area in Mosul, northern Iraq, late Saturday. At least 17 US Army soldiers where killed.

DRANO FOR THE HEART

The conference of the American Heart Association last week revealed news that may signal a new approach to fighting the nation's leading cause of death, heart disease.

By infusing patients with an experimental drug, a doctor from the Cleveland Clinic said he reduced the fatty arterial plaque that triggers most heart attacks by an average of 4.2 percent – about 10 times better than any current method.

MORE ON ROSIE

The judge in the Rosie O'Donnell case said there will be little in the way of monetary damages in the trial over who is to blame for the demise of Rosie magazine, but there is plenty of collateral damage to the publishing industry.

O'Donnell

"This has been a terrible week for the magazine industry," an executive at a competing firm said last week. "Many of us are very careful in terms of our reporting, and now we are going to have to defend ourselves against what these guys did."

DRILLING IN ALASKA

The Senate and House Republicans said they reached an agreement on energy legislation intended to increase domestic production and make transmission networks more reliable.

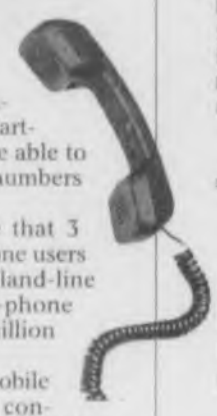
The bill includes construction of a pipeline to bring natural gas from Alaska's North Slope to the Chicago area – what its sponsors call a "total reform" in electricity laws, and higher efficiency standards for many new products.

One thing the bill does not do: call for drilling in parts of Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

A RECOVERY MILESTONE

Paralyzed actor-director Christopher Reeve spoke publicly Friday without the use of a mechanical ventilator, thanks to a "lung pacemaker" operation performed in February.

Reeve



It was the first speech given publicly without the use of his ventilator.

Reeve relies on electrode implants to breathe normally, forgoing a ventilator for up to 18 hours a day.

Since the operation, Reeve has been able to breathe through his mouth and nose – for the first time in eight years – for longer and longer periods of time, relying on an implant powered by an external battery.

A 1995 spinal injury paralyzed the actor who starred as Superman. He has since emerged as a prominent advocate for medical research.

AN END TO LAND-LINE PHONES?

The Federal Communications Commission ruled that starting Nov. 24, consumers will be able to switch their home telephone numbers to their mobile phones.

Industry analysts estimate that 3 percent to 7 percent of telephone users no longer have traditional land-line phones and rely only on cell-phone use. That is as much as 10.5 million people.

As many as 15 percent of mobile phone users said they would consider abandoning their traditional phone service, moving solely to mobile service, according to a survey last spring by the Yankee Group, a market research firm.

STEROIDS AND BASEBALL

Major League Baseball, which has labored under suspicion that some of its star players were using steroids, said that in the first year of testing for the drug, more than 5 percent of players' tests were positive.

As a result, stricter testing standards will go into effect next season.

All players will be tested, and players could be suspended and identified publicly.

Former K-State official found dead

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE, Kan. – The former director of K-State employee relations and former Manhattan city prosecutor was found dead at a rural home north of Lawrence, officials said.

Douglas County authorities are investigating the apparent homicide of Carmin Ross-Murray, 40. The body of the former Manhattan city prosecutor was found Friday.

"We found what we believe is a crime of violence," Douglas County Sheriff Rick Trapp said. He gave no details about how the woman was killed.

An autopsy was begun Saturday, and Trapp said it appeared the slaying could have occurred in the past few days.

Authorities received a telephone call from Ross-Murray's fiance, who Trapp said called from out of state because he had been unable to reach her by phone "for several hours."

He declined to identify the dead woman's ex-husband but said he was a resident of Manhattan. Patrick Caffey, a municipal court judge in Manhattan who heard cases prosecuted by Ross-Murray, confirmed Saturday night that the woman's ex-husband was Thomas E. Murray, an English professor at K-State.

Ross-Murray
FORMER DIRECTOR OF K-STATE EMPLOYEE RELATIONS

Ross-Murray has a 4-year-old daughter from a previous marriage. The girl has been staying with relatives outside of Douglas County and was not at the house at the time of the slaying, Trapp said.

NEIGHBORS' FEARS

So many unanswered questions surrounding the homicide left residents in the Lakeview Lake area feeling unsettled.

"It's not comforting to know something like that happened near here," John Crown said. "This is a pretty quiet corner of the county."

Since the discovery of the body, sheriff's officers and the Lawrence Police Department's crime scene investigations unit have been scouring the house, outbuildings and nearby area.

Douglas County Coroner Dr. Erik Mitchell also worked at the crime scene, Trapp said.

Some leads have been uncovered that have taken the investigation outside of Douglas County, but Trapp declined to say where.

While neighbors said they wanted to find out what happened to Ross-Murray, the sheriff said releasing details of the crime could jeopardize the investigation. He said information investigators have will be checked against tips they get from other sources.

At one time, Ross-Murray was director of employee relations at K-State in Manhattan. She left that position in 1997.

She also had been a Manhattan city prosecutor and worked in conflict mediation and management.

Trapp said he wasn't sure whether Ross-Murray was practicing law in Lawrence but said she was self-employed as a domestic conflict mediator.

Memorial allows friends to remember the good times

By Oksana Boyko
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During his 27 years of his life, Vidyaranya Nanduri made more true friends than most people make by the age of 72.

Friends who fought for him against leukemia until his last day, and whose memories made even complete strangers at the memorial service feel they lost somebody very special.

"If he was here, he wouldn't like us to mourn, so let's remember and share good times we had with Vidya," said Subramanyam Bhadriraju, who led the ceremony at All Faiths Chapel Friday.

Vidya's friends and colleagues came to the microphone one after another to tell stories, sing and pray for Vidya and his family. Many were smiling with suppressed tears in their eyes, some openly crying.

Vidya, graduate student in mathematics, was diagnosed with Acute Myelogenous Leukemia, a cancer of the bone marrow, in January 2003. He underwent four chemotherapy sessions in Via Christi Regional Medical Center in Wichita and Barnes-Jewish Hospital in St. Louis.

His friends set up a fund to raise money for the treatment since Vidya's insurance covered only half of the medical expenses. They also organized a bone marrow drive last May in an attempt to find a donor match for the bone marrow transplantation, which was one of the treatment options. The drive collected 209 blood samples.

The drive resulted in several possible matches, Aruna Suravajjala, graduate student in civil engineering, said.

She said Vidya decided to continue chemotherapy because it was less painful and his chance for a perfect match was one in 20,000.

"After considering all alternatives around the world (including treatment options) in California and India, he finally decided that he would go for a kind of chemotherapy called salvage chemo (that eliminates the option of transplantation)," said Bhavani Garimella, Vidya's friend from Wichita.

Vidya planned to renew treatment after his trip to his homeland. He left the United States on Oct. 22 hoping to meet his spiritual teacher and his old friends in Hyderabad, India. He was planning to come back to K-State for the spring semester, Suravajjala said.

However, his plans never came through. On his fifth day in India, he got a high fever and was admitted to the hospital. Later, he developed pneumonia, and on Nov.7 Vidya suffered a major heart attack.

After 10 minutes he slightly recovered, Suravajjala said, but then got struck with the second heart attack. He died the same day.

As his brother Shankar Nanduri told his friends, when Vidya was taking his last breath, he wanted to thank his doctors, nurses, friends and everybody at K-State who helped him throughout his ordeal.

Vidya's friends and colleagues who spoke about him at the memorial service all noted Vidya's upbeat character and his love of life.

"His disease wasn't contagious, but his optimism was," said David Auckly, associate professor in mathematics and Vidya's academic adviser.

"I remember him always smiling. Always smiling," Sowjanya Kurada, graduate student in computer science, said.

"And that is how he will be always remembered."

Hotel proposal creates concerns around city

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The hotel proposal

K-State officials are considering a proposal for a new hotel and parking garage adjacent to the K-State Student Union. The Collegian explores, in a five-part series the implications of the proposal if approved.

Tuesday: The proposal in-depth.

While K-State officials consider a proposal for a new hotel on campus, local hotel managers are concerned about the effect it would have on their business.

The proposal, led by the KSU Foundation, calls for a hotel and parking garage being built in the current K-State Student Union parking lots, with skyways connecting the garage to the Union. A non-binding contract has been signed with the Shaner Hotel Group to investigate the feasibility of the project.

Gary Hellebust, KSU Foundation president, said Manhattan lost bids for conferences last year not because of a lack of conference space, but no vacancies at area hotels.

"Last year, we lost 30 conventions of 300 people or more because of the lack of quality rooms," he said. "We found there are enough conference facilities because of the Alumni Association and empty classrooms at night."

A study was done in Manhattan two years ago that indicated by 2010 the local economy could handle two more hotels or 120 rooms. K-State's hotel proposal, most likely a Marriott Courtyard, would include 125 rooms.

Brad Everett, Fairfield Inn general manager and Manhattan city commissioner, said the Days Inn, which currently has 119 rooms, will be split into a Quality Inn and Best Western, which will add 40 rooms to the market. The Days Inn manager was out of the country and unavailable for comment.

"At best by 2010 you can add 80 rooms, and K-State is proposing 125," Everett said.

Everett said the new hotel would also conflict with downtown redevelopment plans.

"I think they need to look at what the community is wanting," he said. "The community is focused on downtown redevelopment where there is a hotel proposed down there. Parking is an issue. Aggieville is looking to do a parking garage that would accommodate K-State."

Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager, said there has not been a proposal for a hotel in the downtown area, but it is just a concept being discussed.

"No one has contacted the city about putting up a building there," Hilgers said. "From a city standpoint, things have been brainstormed, things have been talked about. We haven't received an application from any hotel. Zoning has not looked at it."

Everett said state averages show occupancies at 54 percent, while Manhattan area hotels sit at 62 percent occupancy. But after the rooms reserved for Fort Riley soldiers who are awaiting deployment are subtracted, the occupancy rate is back to 50 percent, he said.

The Holiday Inn, which has occupancy of 197 as well as 10 conference rooms, has had to deny hundreds of reservations on busy weekends, Sarah Vollmer, front desk manager, said.

Vollmer said the busiest weekends are home football games, Country Stampede and graduations. But without an event or large conference in town for the weekend, occupancy only reaches 30 percent.

"I think we do a good job in accommodating most of the demand for rooms in Manhattan with the exception of Country Stampede," she said. "I don't really feel we need another hotel because in the long run the only times we would need it would be special events. During our slow times, it would just be an excessive amount of rooms available in Manhattan."

Chamber of Commerce president Lyle Butler said there does seem to be a need for additional conference facilities rather than hotel rooms.

"There is a need for conference facilities when you say that, it isn't necessarily a room," he said. "Conference centers need to be versatile and can be adapted for a variety of uses. The problem with that is just building a conference center doesn't pay for itself.

"It's usually part of a hotel or university or the community has to subsidize it."

Vollmer said even if the hotel proposal does go through for campus, business at the Holiday Inn wouldn't be affected.

"We contract out most of our business and Holiday Inn is a brand people stay loyal to. Although, I think it may congest traffic on campus and would be a good learning experience. But we employ plenty of people who are looking into that field. Most of our staff is under 30."

Everett said the Fairfield Inn has also maintained a good relationship with the hotel and restaurant management department as well as working with conference leaders, but has trouble seeing that relationship continue if the new hotel is built.

"My property has been a good neighbor with K-State and helping out departments with last minute arrangements and groups," he said. "I think that if K-State builds this hotel, it's going to be very difficult for a lot of the partners to maintain a healthy relationship."

TO THE POINT

Students should stay informed as hotel proposal is heard

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

We encourage students to pay attention to this week's series that investigates different aspects of the proposal to build a hotel in the parking lot south of the K-State Student Union.

The Collegian decided to run this series because we believe it is important for students to educate themselves about the workings of this proposal and take a stance on this potential campus addition.

It is a good idea to get involved in this process, as no permanent decisions have been made. Students and faculty still have a chance to hear their opinions.

Thus far, the proposal has moved quickly, so it is likely that K-State officials won't sit on this decision long. Students who want to voice their opinions shouldn't count on having an excess of time to do so.

With this proposal has come many rumors about the benefits and disadvantages of the proposed hotel, and we hope to sort through them and find the facts.

We also encourage students to get involved this week. Write letters to the editor voicing concerns or praise for the proposal.

Students also can contact their student senator or the KSU Foundation with questions, comments or concerns.

One way or another – get involved.

Dream on

Dreams provide motivation even when they don't come true

Robert Kennedy once said, "Some men see things as they are and ask 'Why?' I dream of things that never were and ask 'Why not?'"

AMY LINK

I confess, I'm a dreamer. I have a thousand dreams.

I want to see the ball drop in Times Square, I want to fly to Europe on a moment's notice, I want to fall in love forever, I want to win an Oscar and I want to change the world, but something seeks to prevent me from doing all these things – fear.

Few have a way with taking our dreams from us, as does age.

Upon our arrival at college, we may have a far different expectation of what our life will be like when we leave college. After all, high school graduation is a time of high hopes.

For instance, you may have arrived at K-State planning to be a doctor and then failed a chemistry course – now, the dream is dead.

Maybe you were expecting to be engaged by the time you graduated, and now you have picked out the graduation gown but not the wedding gown.

Some may have wanted to be a star college athlete and found themselves benched, so their dreams ended.

As we get older, we tend to think it is time to move on and let go of our childhood dreams, but it is not. Dreams are reflections of the people we are and want to be. To lose them is to lose a part of us.

However, this does not mean our dreams should not evolve. They need to grow with us, which means we need to let go of certain childhood fantasies.

For instance, I know I will never hit the game-winning shot in the NCAA finals, but that does not mean the dream ends.

The setting of the dream may be the NCAA finals, but the dream is really about doing something amazing under pressure in front of the world.

This is still possible.

We can only conceive our dreams; we do not get to dictate how they come true.

For us to realize our dreams, we must do something that can be difficult – staying true to them.

It seems that as we grow, it becomes easier to give in to critics or other circumstances.

Whether it is the fear of being alone that leads you to cling to a bad relationship, a bad grade that convinces you to give up a major, the fear of failure that prevents you from taking risks, or just the thought that big dreams are only for children, it doesn't matter.

We need dreams now more than ever.

They give us hope when times are tough. We take risks and let our hearts lead to achieve them. Basically, they give us reasons to live.

They keep us going even when we're stuck in a lousy routine.

At some point in our lives, we all feel that life has gotten the best of us, and our first tendency is to be critical of ever achieving our dreams. Thus, we want to forget them.

However, dreams make the most sense when times are tough, because they are often the key to our escape from the bad times.

So keep your dreams, no matter how silly people say they are. Big dreams don't end with puberty, graduation or marriage. They are part of who we are.

Let them change and grow, but always keep them with you, no matter how ridiculous you may think they are.

After all, everything truly remarkable in life probably started out as someone's crazy dream.

Trust, communication trump all problems in romantic relationship

I have been with the same woman for more than 15 months.

I love her dearly, and she loves me.

JESSE LOEWEN

Our relationship has seen its share of good times and bad times. Through them I have learned that trust, communication, honesty and affection are critical to a healthy relationship.

Romantic relationships are difficult. No two people can always agree on everything. One may want to take the next step sooner than the other. One person may detest something the other enjoys.

Romantic relationships take a lot of work if they are to survive, but usually, through the efforts both parties put forth, the relationship is strengthened with each trial.

I speak from experience.

My girlfriend and I are not a perfect couple. We have our spats. She is ready for marriage, and I am not. I think a pre-nuptial agreement is critical; she finds the idea insulting. I despise organized religion, and she is Catholic.

We have managed to work through these problems, except for the marriage thing – she is still hoping and I am still not sure. In the process we love each other more.

Our relationship has remained strong in spite of our problems because we are open and honest with each other. I tell her everything, and she tells me everything.

During all of our fights, we talk, try to figure out where the problem really lies and what we can do about it.

Most of our fights have been resolved just by getting the other's point of view and coming to an agreement.

Last year, when she told me she was not sure our relationship would last if I was too far away during the summer, I asked her what the point of our being together was if a little thing like a few months apart could bring it down.

We talked about the emotional hardships we would have to endure – not being able to touch or see each other every day.

When I told her I would rather have her from afar than not have her at all, the fight was over and our relationship was stronger than it had been before.

Some fights have not been resolved that way, fights we could never reach agreement on.

Conflicts can make a relationship stronger if they are properly resolved, but trust, honesty, communication and affection are critical outside of conflict as well.

Everyone has a secret they are burning to tell, but can tell no one without fear. The trading of these secrets lets two people know more about each other than they would otherwise.

They let two people see each other's hearts and know each other's vulnerabilities. I have no secrets from my girlfriend, nor she from me. What we have told each other has brought us closer than we could ever be otherwise. Every day we show each other our love and we never take each other for granted.

Because we have shared our secrets, talked through our problems, and given each other our affection, we love each other.

I believe that only through trust, communication and affection can love develop, and urge everyone to practice these in their relationships.

We trust each other with our hearts, our secrets and our sins.

Wall Street improvements aid Foundation accounts

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stock market improvements have caused some K-State Foundation accounts to rise above their original value – a different story from February, where a number of them dropped below their original market value.

Alan Klug, vice president of administration and finance for the Foundation, said about 100 accounts – a little less than one-tenth of the total foundation – lifted due to a stock market return of 4.4 percent between July 1 and Sept. 30, the first quarter of the new fiscal year.

Generally when an account drops below stock market value, the Foundation makes up for it using its underwriting fund.

However in February, when a number of accounts dropped below market value for the second or third consecutive year, the Foundation reached a point where they could not continue to take money out of underwriting fund anymore, Julie Lea, communications director for the Foundation, said.

Recent stock market improvements have increased the market value of the affected accounts that had previously fallen below their originally established value.

But there is still room for concern, officials said.

Foundation officials were able to meet the 2003-2004 aid requirements with help from the University Central Administration. The administration had already made a commitment of scholarships and honored all of them for this school year, Klug said.

Now the focus is on the aid distribution for the 2004-2005 school year, which remains unclear.

Although the recently lifted accounts may go toward next year's distributions, Klug said there is no way to find out how much aid the Foundation can distribute for the next school year until June 30, 2004.

"We'll have to wait and find out," he said. "Obviously, if we don't earn the money, we can't give it away."

In addition, Lea said the Foundation is keeping a close eye on the stock market.

"We look at all funds on a quarterly basis – a close eye is kept on them along the way," she said.

Did you know?

How the Foundation funds work

Julie Lea, communications director for the Foundation, provides the following anecdote describing how an account in the Foundation could fall below market value:

- A couple of years ago, an alumnus established a scholarship and gave the Foundation $10,000 (the minimum amount put into the endowment).
- The Foundation would not award any money until an interest accrued.
- The first year the Foundation makes some interest and makes an award with it. This continues for three years.
- The next year, the stock market goes down and even though the fund goes below market value, the Foundation makes the distribution and makes up the costs.
- The following year, the account falls below market value again, but the Foundation still makes the distribution in a similar fashion.
- After two years, the Foundation can no longer make up the costs and reaches a point where it cannot make the distribution (such as the case in February).

Week to promote studies abroad

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius announced last week, that 7,000 students from more than 100 countries are now studying in Kansas.

She also reported that more than 1,000 Kansas students will study abroad this year. Thus, she formally announced Kansas' involvement with International Education Week.

Kenneth Holland, associate provost of international programs, went to hear Sebelius' announcement.

Now K-State will heed her words.For the first time, K-State will recognize the week with a schedule of activities.

Connie Nobel, office of international programs manager, said although K-State has done lectures in the past, she has seen opportunity for higher organization for the week's activities.

She said she hopes the week's events will help students acknowledge the contributions foreign-born students and faculty make to the campus community.

At 3:30 p.m. today in Union 212, Holland will present "New Incentives for Faculty-led Group Travel Abroad." Nobel said the speech will highlight the foreign-born faculty and students at K-State.

Donna Davis, director of the international student center, will present a speech "SEVIS: Impact of New Immigration Regulation on K-State." She will speak at noon on Tuesday in the Union Courtyard. Davis said SEVIS stands for Student and Exchange Visitor Information Systems.

Grace Hwang, director of development for international programs and Hale Library, is hosting an international summit from 9 a.m. to noon on Friday.

"Each day there's something going on. There are new requirements since Sept. 11," she said. "It's very interesting from a school point of view."

The summit will bring together corporate partners and high executives that look for diversity in their workers, she said.

"We'd like to make KSU students aware of the opportunity to work and live globally. That is what these companies will speak of," Hwang said.

Michael Suleiman, distinguished professor in political science, has been researching his topic, "Arabs in America: The Need to Write Them into American History," for 25 years.

He is the keynote speaker at 2 p.m. Friday.

Suleiman said he has been reading papers and listening to television and radio to observe how they cover Middle East and Arab communities. He looks at corrections that can be made and the negative stereotypes associated with Middle Eastern countries.

"I'll cover the Arab community in the U.S. Basically, it is a history of the challenges Arabs have faced and how far they've gotten in becoming accepted as US citizens," he said.

Following Suleiman's speech, the presentation for the International Education Award is planned for 4 p.m. with a reception following.

To draw the week's activities to an end, the monthly International Coffee Hour is from 4 to 5 p.m., at the International Student Center. Every Coffee Hour, a student and their country is showcased.

On Friday, John Cash, graduate student in public administration, will present "The Bahamas: Is it as Good As They Say It Is?"

Al Qaeda reportedly responsible for Turkish attacks

ISTANBUL, Turkey – An Arab newspaper reported Sunday that it received a claim of responsibility from the al Qaeda terrorist group for the car bomb attacks that killed 23 people in two Istanbul synagogues a day earlier.

The statement received by the London-based daily Al-Quds Al-Arabi, a copy of which was obtained by The Associated Press, said the group carried out the attack because it believed that agents of Mossad, Israel's intelligence agency, were in the synagogues.

Abdel Bari Atwan, the newspaper's editor, told the pan-Arab cable station Al-Jazeera that the claim was received by e-mail from the Abu Hafs al-Masri Brigades, which has been identified as part of al Qaeda and has sent at least three claims regarding attacks.

The sophisticated attacks on the synagogues used pickup trucks stuffed with nearly identical explosives detonated minutes apart, likely by suicide bombers, officials said.

Israeli intelligence and explosives experts have teamed with Turkish investigators to investigate the bombings, which wounded more than 300 people, both Jews at the synagogues and Muslim bystanders on the streets.

Earlier, Turkey's interior minister told The Associated Press that a link to international terrorists was likely. However, the interior ministry declined to comment on the reported claim of responsibility.

Forensic workers pieced together body parts and searched for clues amid the wreckage from blasts that Israeli experts said were stronger than most bombings they see at home.

Officials found two bodies fitted with wire, and one of them matched partial remains found in one of the attack cars, media reported, suggesting that the explosions were set off by suicide bombers and not by remote control.

Interior Minister Abdulkadir Aksu told the AP that there is a "more than 95 percent" chance that the attacks were suicide bombings.

"I am not saying 100 percent because the investigation is still underway, but I was convinced that these attacks were suicide bombings after I saw the scenes of the attacks and was briefed by authorities," Aksu said.

"It is very likely that there is an international connection. We are not ruling out any possibility, including al-Qaeda involvement," he said, adding that the identities or nationalities of the bombers were still unknown.

Local charity program turns to volunteer staff

Junction City's Salvation Army, currently supporting a paid staff, will switch to a volunteer pilot program Nov. 19.

Deb Abner, field coordinator for Kansas and Western Missouri divisional headquarters, said the switch is only in Junction City.

"We are going to work with it here for a while, see if it works. If it does, we may try to develop in the community and counties where there is no business to help others," she said.

Abner said rather than paying the staff, they will use the salaries as family service funds.

"We want to be able to serve the needs of the county and of the community. By using volunteers that have a helping heart, we can take those funds and serve families instead of providing a salary," Abner said.

Auxiliary Capt. Johnny Harsh of the Manhattan Salvation Army said it has no intention of changing the way the store is run.

The Salvation Army store will stay open, but Abner said they are in search of volunteers.

Despite the switch, Abner said the employees have agreed to stay as volunteers.

"We've had a really good turnout of volunteers. The high school, the military base, the United Way, the churches – it's a bandwagon of good volunteers," Abner said.

Abner said volunteering is especially important during the holidays.

"Bell-ringers start November 28, people can put gifts together, we have adopt an angel. Even with all of these volunteer opportunities, people are still willing to help with our store," Abner said.

Volunteering is also a great gift for the holidays, she said.

"The neat thing about volunteering is that it is a gift. Some people give material things, some give gifts of themselves. Time and talent is invaluable, helping others is a great gift to all," Abner said.

Cats upend Huskers at home for first time since 1982

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They finally did it.

The No. 5 ranked K-State volleyball team defeated No. 10 Nebraska 30-28, 29-31, 30-26, and 30-25 in front of a record crowd of 5,286 at Ahearn Field House on Saturday.

It was the first time since 1982 the Wildcats defeated the Huskers at home. The win also marked the first time in school history for K-State (25-3, 15-1) to sweep Nebraska (23-4, 14-3) in a single season.

"It's pretty sweet," middle blocker Lauren Goehring said. "We weren't afraid of them tonight. We'd beaten them once and it felt real good, so we were ready to do it again tonight."

Outside hitters Valeria Hejjas and Cari Jensen led the Wildcat offense with a total of 27 kills, while setter Gabby Guerre had 50 assists.

Goehring had 11 kills and three service aces.

"Every game we go in and talk about serving tough," Goehring said. "The tougher we serve, the harder it is for them to pass, so that's always a keeper thing."

Coach Suzie Fritz said her team's senior leadership led K-State to the win.

"I think that continues to be a very strong identity of this team," Fritz said. "They don't make a lot of unforced errors. They're very experienced and when it comes to very high pressure situations, they're very composed."

Composure, Goehring said, was an important factor when going against a strong Nebraska team.

"If you get flustered when they get a few points in a row, it's bad news, because they'll take over, which I think has happened to us in the past," she said.

Senior libero Laura Downey-Wallace dives to make a save that later became a point during the fourth game against Nebraska on Saturday night in Ahearn Field House. The Cats will be back in action Wednesday night in Oklahoma.

The match's first game ended on a kill from Hejjas. Down 23-18, the Wildcats went on a 5-0 serving streak by Guerre to cap the win.

In the second game, both teams bounced back and forth between scores. Tied 29-29, Nebraska outside hitter Anna Schrad ended the game with two consecutive service points.

K-State, however, came back in games three and four to win by the largest margins of the match.

Fritz said the Wildcats' ability to side out and get the serve back during critical points of the match was important.

Cats' defensive prowess stifles Cornhuskers

Forced turnovers mark worst home loss in 45 years for Nebraska

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LINCOLN, Neb. – Wildcat defenders have become better students of the game, defensive coordinator Bret Bielema said.

That's only fitting in a stadium that has been home to the most academic All-Americans in the history of college football.

Even more fitting is that the No. 6 defense in the country helped do what only five other teams had done in the last 16 years in Lincoln – win.

The 38-9 victory was the worst home loss for the Cornhuskers since 1958.

"We knew it was going to be a brawl," linebacker Josh Buhl said. "Every time we play, it's personal. This means a lot to our program and to our fans."

K-State held the No. 5 rushing offense in the country to 46 yards below its season average. It was only the sixth time Nebraska was held to 100 yards rushing since 1997.

"What was different was that we actually played the way that we are used to playing," defensive lineman Thomas Houchin said. "These are the same kids we played last year. We knew what Nebraska can do – they don't keep that a secret."

Houchin had seven tackles on the day, including a tackle for a loss, a quarterback sack and a blocked field goal.

The Huskers had four turnovers, two fumbles and two interceptions, all in the second half, and K-State is now 63-0 when holding opponents to 10 points or less.

"The more plays, the quieter people got," Buhl said. "People started leaving, and that was great to see. I have never seen Nebraska fans leaving a Nebraska game."

Bringing their season sack total to 44, the Cats kept Husker quarterback Jammal Lord in check by sacking him and intercepting him twice.

Lord finished 8-of-26 passing for 98 yards while gaining 88 rushing yards. The 26 pass attempts topped his career high from last year's K-State game, when he was forced to throw 25 times.

K-State linebacker Josh Buhl closes in on Nebraska's Ross Pilkington during the first half of the Wildcats' 38-9 win over the Huskers on Saturday at Memorial Stadium in Lincoln.

"They were flustered all day," Buhl said. "but they never gave up. They kept fighting, kept playing and kept talking. They were frustrated a lot all day, but they never stopped."

Buhl had six tackles, including two for a loss.

In a locker room atmosphere which Coach Bill Snyder described as overwhelmed by emotion prior to the start of the game, Buhl said the halftime atmosphere quickly turned to silence, focus and determination.

"We got the momentum," he said. "It should have been 7-0 but we understand that and we just wanted to come out in the second half and play our ball. We wanted to control the run, control the pass and not let them get in there."

Roberson dominates in second half for victory

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LINCOLN, Neb. – Nebraska's Memorial Stadium sat eerily silent as the third quarter wound to an end Saturday afternoon.

The only intelligible noise, more than 5,000 K-State fans – mostly confined to one corner, but sprinkled throughout – chanting K-S-U.

On the sideline, Ell Roberson stood still, helmet in hand, staring onto the field where he had overcome turnovers and only marginally effective running to help his team to a 17-7 lead.

Just two plays and 30 seconds later, he was not standing still any longer.

He had dropped back, pump faked as wide receiver James Terry stopped, and then hurled the ball deep as Terry continued his route, zipped past the baffled defensive back, and caught the ball, running 63 yards for a touchdown.

Thirty ticks into the fourth quarter, Roberson celebrated the touchdown by lassoing his arm as he cut across the field to the sideline.

On a touchdown pass that drove the stake into the Huskers' heart, Roberson vanquished his demons and won the game.

"His leadership, his control on the field, it was tremendous," wide receiver Antoine Polite said. "He did a great job of commanding the offense on the second half and getting us going. I'm real proud of Ell. He's a senior. He was excited and he did a great job today."

Roberson was sizzling into the fourth quarter, but once again, he began cold. He threw two interceptions in the second quarter, including one in the endzone on a drive that could have put the Cats up 14-0.

He nearly tossed another as well. A Nebraska defensive back dropped a pass at the goal line after K-State drove 70 yards to the Husker 10 yard line.

But after the half, Roberson dominated.

He piled up 52 yards rushing, 159 passing and added three touchdowns. What had been a stalemate at the break, Roberson engineered into a blowout.

Cross Country runners move to nationals

3 Wildcats earn All-Midwest Region honors

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most coaches would tell you hard work, perseverance and continued improvement only lead to good.

For two K-State cross country runners, it led to a trip to the national championships.

Chesang finished the 10,000 meter race third overall in 31:02, while Culbertson finished in 21:36 to earn ninth place in the women's 6,000 meter race.

Both qualify for the NCAA National Championships on Nov. 24 in Waterloo, Iowa.

Sophomore Rogers Kipchumba finished 14th overall, and all three runners were named to the All-Midwest Region team–an honor earned by finishing in the top 25.

Coach Randy Cole's emotions were evident after the meet.

"I'm fired up," he said. "We've been consistently working hard and have made it through the ups and downs of the season."

For Chesang and Culbertson, it will be their first trip to nationals, Kipchumba's fate will rest in the balance of an NCAA selection committee.

In a process similar to the NCAA basketball tournaments, some runners and teams qualify automatically, while other runners will be selected at-large by a committee. Cole said Kipchumba is one to be "on the bubble."

Chesang and Kipchumba's performances led the men to a 13th-place team finish out of 21 teams.

"Rogers and Mathew ran their race and executed, and Mathew got one of the highest regional placings in K-State history," Cole said.

Culbertson, meanwhile, turned in the best race of her career – a race Cole said was a product of her hard work.

"Trisha is a great example of someone putting in time and effort and having it pay off," Cole said.

Culbertson's performance was significant for the Wildcat women, as the squad was depleted by injuries prior to the race.

Freshman Stefanie Murer – who finished fifth at the Big 12 conference championships – was sidelined with back and leg problems.

Junior Shauna Burrell was also forced out of action with an achilles injury and sophomore Lysaira Roman-Del Valle did not race.

The injuries were the overriding factor to the women finishing 21st out of 24 teams.

Kansas, Missouri, and Oklahoma also placed in the top 10 overall in both the men's and women's team scores.

But after big races such as the NCAA Regional, Cole said his runners advancing to Nationals will be ready.

"It can be pretty overwhelming, but that's why you go to the Cowboy Jamboree and the Chile Pepper Invitational – for that big meet feel," Cole said.

Women lose to Purdue 79-69 in State Farm Tip-Off Classic

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WEST LAFAYETTE, Ind. – Coach Deb Patterson had high expectations entering K-State's season-opener against Purdue.

Those expectations took a hit Saturday as the No. 7 Boilermakers defeated the No. 5 Wildcats 79-69 in the State Farm Tip Off Classic at Mackey Arena.

"This is what we talked about," Patterson said. "An early season test to find out where we're at."

K-State got off to a slow start, hitting four of its first 15 shots, but managed to hang with the Boilermakers throughout the first half. That was largely due to the pull-up jump shot of Kendra Wecker, who had 10 first-half points.

In the second half, K-State scored nine of the first 13 points to take a 44-43 lead at the 16:19 mark, but Purdue went on a run of its own.

The Boilermakers outscored K-State 18-6 over the next 8:35 to pull ahead 62-49 – and they wouldn't look back.

Extending its lead to 17 at one point, Purdue physically dominated the Wildcats in the post.

Guard Laurie Koehn said that was the downfall of the Wildcat offense.

"We probably should have gotten it into the post more often," she said. "By not establishing the post game, they were forcing us into some bad outside shots."

That led to K-State hitting just 5-of-18 on three-pointers.

Koehn single-handedly tried to keep K-State close, and her 22 points led all scorers. But every time Koehn would hit a shot, the Boilermakers responded.

Purdue hit better than 55 percent from the field, including 4-of-8 on three pointers, and spread the wealth with five different players scoring in double-digits.

"We didn't string together enough stops on the defensive end," Wecker said. "If we scored on offense, they came right back down and jammed it down our throats."

Beth Jones, who hit three-straight three-pointers in the first half, and All-Big 10 guard Erika Valek led the Boilermakers with 16 points each.

But on a night in which Wildcat center Nicole Ohlde broke the all-time K-State scoring record, the senior All-American battled poor shooting and foul trouble.

Senior center becomes all-time leading scorer

WEST LAFAYETTE, Ind. – She needed exactly seven points.

She got nine.

With 7:13 left in the game, senior center Nicole Ohlde became K-State's all-time leading scorer, laying the ball in the basket and getting fouled on the way.

The point rewrote the record books, but the missed free throw told the story of her night.

After the public address announcer informed the crowd of the achievement, applause and recognition followed.

Ohlde's efforts came up short, offensively and defensively, as Purdue rolled to a 79-69 victory in the second game of the 2003 State Farm Women's Tip-Off Classic at Purdue's Mackey Arena.

Reflecting on the record after the game, Ohlde gave her trademark smile, but her face told a different story.

"Its not really on my mind at this moment," Ohlde said. "I'm just thinking of this game and needing to get better before the next game."

On a night when post play was never established for the Cats, Ohlde shot 2 of 8 from the field and ended the game with nine points, three rebounds, three assists, three turnovers and one block. Purdue's Emily Heikes, in charge of defending against Ohlde for the game, said she wanted to accomplish two things in the paint.

"Not let her get the ball," Heikes said. "That was pretty much my goal throughout the game, was not letting her touch the ball and becoming a better defender."

Although pressure by Purdue contained her, Ohlde said she placed just as much pressure on herself.

Men's basketball captures 1st win of the season

The K-State men's basketball team won its first game of the 2003-04 season Saturday, but it wasn't easy.

Freshman forward Cartier Martin hit a driving lay-up with 40 seconds left as the Wildcats, who led by as many as 13 in the second half, held off Global Sports 70-68 in an exhibition game at Bramlage Coliseum.

"We played better tonight then we did last week," Coach Jim Wooldridge said. "Last week we had some turnovers and missed opportunities that were our Achilles heel. I told the guys after the game that this was a good learning experience for us. Fortunately, we came out on the winning side of it."

K-State shot 53.6 percent from the field in the first half, but only led Global Sports by four at the break, 37-33.

The Wildcats broke a 16-all tie with an 8-0 run to put them ahead 24-18 with a little over seven minutes to play before halftime.

Global Sports was able to respond, closing the gap to 29-28 with 3:13 to play.

K-State came out hot in the second half and mounted a 14-6 run, capped by a three pointer from freshman guard Lance Harris to put the Wildcats up 51-39 with under 15 minutes to play.

But Global Sports again refused to give up.

Trailing by 11 points with 8:49 remaining, Global went on a run of its own and cut the Wildcat lead to one with just under three minutes to play.

A pair of free throws by senior guard Frank Richards put the Wildcats ahead 67-64 before a free throw and three-pointer by Global Sports' Jermaine Lewis gave Global its first lead at 68-67.

New pita shop has some kinks

Pita Pit

Restaurant review by Seth Bishop

Aggieville is attracting some interesting merchants to add to the unique variety of wares and services found there. Most recently, The Pita Pit has opened its doors to serve up exotic and healthy choices of pita sandwiches.

In response, to the rumblings of my stomach, and the phone call from my editor the day before, I decided to give the Pita Pit a try

Not knowing exactly what was on the menu, I consulted their Web site to view their offerings. Annoyance No. 1: the page would not load. However, it is possible this is a Bill Gates problem and not a Pita Pit problem, so I kept an open mind.

Instead, I drove to the restaurant and returned home with a menu. I did this, in part, because I was feeding more than myself, and my companions needed to view the menu as well. Also, I wanted to test the delivery service that Pita Pit offers.

I listed off everyone's selections and made a phone call. Annoyance No. 2: Chicken Souvlaki is not an option. I know Bill Gates had nothing to do with deciding what was printed on these menus.

Was there a tremendous demand for Chicken Souvlaki a few days prior, and the restaurant has run out? Poor management planning on the food order? Tsk-tsk. The Chicken Souvlaki was replaced with the Chicken Caesar and the order was placed.

Annoyance No. 3: checks not accepted. I needed to run to the ATM and get some cash. If I wanted to work this hard for lunch, I could have made my own sandwich and wrote myself a check.

Annoyance No. 4: I have plenty of time to contemplate my hunger. Even after my trip to the ATM, I still wait for the delivery of my food.

Assembling the sandwich took two minutes, and it is a 10-minute drive from Moro Street to my house. Lunch arrived 40 minutes after the order was placed. I did not know if the gyro meat is supposed to be hot when the sandwich is made, but it was not by the time I ate it.

Annoyance No. 5: lettuce. Somewhere along the line, this country got the idea that healthy means half as much meat and twice as much lettuce. If I was having colon trouble, I might be thankful for the roughage and high water content of lettuce, but I'm not. I want some meat. If McDonald's is viewed as our lunchtime standard, you could wrap a Snickers bar in a pita and still be healthier!

Minor annoyances aside, The Pita Pit serves up a tasty lunchtime option. Their prices are decent and their pita sandwiches and salads add a nice variety to Manhattan cuisine. My advice, though, is definitely pay extra for the additional meat and if it is delivered, order with time to spare.

New Aggieville restaurant is first branch in Kansas; Combines healthy alternative with late nights and delivery

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Healthy food for everyone – even the late crowd.

Pita Pit, a new fast food restaurant in Aggieville, opened Oct. 20.

The focus of the restaurant is to offer healthy food, said Sarah Warnock, co-owner of Pita Pit in Manhattan.

"It's actually really healthy," she said. "We offer a healthy alternative for the fried fast food."

Pita Pit's food is based on a Greek theme, she said.

Customers can choose from a variety of pitas and salads including several vegetarian selections.

"I think what makes us unique is a great selection of vegetarian, which you don't find a lot," she said. "There is nutrition information on the back of the menus."

Warnock said the business hasn't done much advertising other than word-of-mouth, but they still have received quite a bit of business.

"It's been great," she said. "Better than we expected."

Pita Pit is a Canadian-based franchise, and this is the first one in Kansas, she said.

Warnock said she and her husband, Bryan, moved from Boise, Idaho, to run the store in Manhattan.

"We chose Manhattan because it is a big college town, and Aggieville was a great location for the late-night crowd," she said. "Pita Pit targets college towns."

Rebecca Pauly, freshman in elementary education and shift manager for Pita Pit, said she does not think there will be too much competition from other late-night businesses.

"I don't think we're going to have a problem because not many are open that late," she said. "There are a lot people coming out of the bars that should be able to support us."

Pauly said Pita Pit offers a unique food choice that should be able to draw in those people who especially want healthy food.

"We have gyros, which is something you don't find at many fast food places," she said.

They also have a Julienne salad that includes ham and turkey on it, she said.

Daniels said employees make the food in front of the customer, but they don't pass it down the line.

"We each take one customer and make the whole thing," she said. "We don't have one person in charge of lettuce and tomatoes." She said they also deliver.

The price range for their meat pitas is from $4.10 to $5.25, vegetarian pitas are $3 to $4.10, and salads are $4.25 to $5.25.

Melissa Daniels, senior in social science and Pita Pit employee, said she thinks the late shift sees more customers than most people might think.

"It's amazing how many people come in that late," she said. "Actually, it's the busiest I've been since I've been here. Some of them are drunk which makes it more entertaining to us."

Daniels was recently hired and has worked only four shifts. Her work schedule has been flexible with her class schedule, she said.

"During the week, I can't work during the day, so I have been working from five to 11," she said. "Once during the week I can work a late shift."

So far, she likes the job."I enjoy working at Pita Pit," she said. "It's a real relaxed atmosphere."

Nicole Kidman receives award

Nicole Kidman has a jump start on the upcoming awards season.

The Oscar-winner and star of the new dramas "The Human Stain," "Cold Mountain" and "Dogville" collected the 18th annual American Cinematheque award Friday night for career achievement.

Acting "was what I wanted to do since I was a very strange little girl in Sydney, Australia," Kidman told a star-studded gathering at the Beverly Hilton Hotel that included actors James Caan, Adrien Brody, Lauren Bacall and Kidman's childhood friend Naomi Watts.

Weekend box office results

Will Ferrell's "Elf" scuttled Russell Crowe's "Master and Commander: The Far Side of the World" to finish as the weekend's No. 1 movie.

"Elf," about a man-child raised by Santa's helpers at the North Pole, took in $27.2 million, off just 12 percent from its second-place debut the previous weekend, according to studio estimates Sunday.

"Master and Commander," a Napoleonic-era naval adventure based on Patrick O'Brian's novels about an intrepid British captain, debuted a close second with $25.7 million.

Audiences jumped ship on the previous weekend's No. 1 movie, "The Matrix Revolutions," which took the No. 3 position at $16.3 million, down a steep 66 percent from its debut.

Luther Vandross among AMA winners

Soul singer Luther Vandross, who is recovering from a debilitating stroke that threatened to end not only his career but his life, won a leading two American Music Awards on Sunday.

Tough-guy rapper 50 Cent also won two awards for best male rap artist and best rap-hip-hop album for "Get Rich or Die Tryin,'" a gritty CD about his many brushes with death on the street.

Alabama collected its 23rd American Music Award, this one for favorite country group. The quartet has more AMA wins than any other performer — followed by Michael Jackson with 21 and Kenny Rogers with 19.

The late soul songstress Aaliyah was honored as best female R&B artist, her third American Music Award since she died in a plane crash in 2001.

DEATH | Highway accident leaves 1 dead, 3 injured; friends hope, pray suffering a punctured spleen and collapsed lung. He remains in the hospital in stable condition.

The accident occurred on U.S. Highway 77 near Randolph, Kan. Riordan was driving north when he went off the right shoulder to avoid a car crossing the center line. He then overcorrected, hitting a car traveling south, driven by Jeffrey Tryon of Waterville, Kan. Tryon, who was not wearing a seatbelt, was killed instantly.

Riordan's car then went airborne, landing on top of a vehicle driven by Donna Logback of Manhattan. Logback was taken to Mercy Health Center, but her condition was not available.

All four students were members of KSU Navigators, a Christian campus organization. Jacob Holland, junior in broadcast journalism, said he played basketball at the Rec with Armstrong, Lovig and Riordan. After spending time at the hospital, Holland said the students in Navigators have been praying for their friends' recovery.

"All day and night being on our knees and relying on God," he said. "We have that hope."

Joel Johnson, Navigators leader, said he had spent time with Armstrong at a conference several weeks ago.

"I have known Kevin to some degree over the past couple of years," he said. "Kevin really had a tenderness about him and was a strong character in the way he related to people and the way he treated people."

Johnson said Armstrong had written his thoughts about his life in a memo following the conference.

Armstrong wrote, "I really cherish everything that God has sacrificed for us. To trust God fully and in everything that we do because He will let us know His true will. Therefore, we must fully commit ourselves to Christ because He is our ultimate fulfillment."

Jen Johnson, also a Navigators leader, said Armstrong's faith is what will help his friends cope with his death in the coming weeks.

"I think in the midst of tragedy, we can have tremendous hope knowing that Kevin is with Jesus because he has a personal relationship with him," she said.

A campus memorial for Armstrong has not yet been announced.

While friends cope with Armstrong's death, they are supporting the others who were injured. Charlie Delph, Mollie's father, said the outpouring of support for his daughter has been overwhelming.

"I think in the midst of the tragedy, we can have tremendous hope knowing that Kevin is with Jesus because he has a personal relationship with him."

Mollie is sedated and still on a respirator because of the swelling in her throat and neck, he said. He said he approaches her prognosis with a cautiously optimistic outlook.

"As they lower sedation she becomes alert and responsive and responds to commands. For the most part, that's very positive news."

Delph said during the next two days Mollie would be monitored closely for brain injury, as some types of trauma do not appear for 72 hours following the accident.

"All in all, she is very stable and improving. We just continue to pray for her," he said.

Jen Johnson, who spent Saturday with the Delph family, said Mollie was able to move her hands and toes. It is Mollie's faith and determination that will get her through her tragedy, she said.

"She is definitely a fighter and has a strong will," she said. "Even yesterday she was under sedation, and they lowered it. She tried to sit up by herself and take her breathing tube out. She's a fighter."

Fort Hayes student dies from injuries in fight

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HAYS, Kan. – The president of Fort Hays State University is urging students to help police investigate a large fight that claimed the life of a student.

Authorities said 18-year-old Clint Johnson, of Healy, died Saturday at a Wichita hospital from injuries suffered during a fight early Thursday at an apartment complex north of the campus.

Ellis County Attorney Tom Drees said numerous people were involved in several skirmishes taking place between the buildings and in the parking lot.

Johnson, a business major, was unconscious when police arrived around 2:40 a.m. Thursday.

"At this time, it is believed that Clint Johnson died from wounds suffered when he was struck repeatedly on the head," Drees said.

University President Ed Hammond said an e-mail was sent to everyone on campus Friday urging them to tell police anything they know about the fight.

"We are grieving along with parents. We send our condolences to them," Hammond said. "There's no way an 18-year-old needs to have suffered this kind of demise. The university is doing everything possible to cooperate with law enforcement to bring the parties responsible to justice."

Diane Scott, assistant vice president for student affairs, described Johnson as well-liked and active in campus life.

"He was a great academic student. He was involved. He was one of those students that you want 1,000 of them on this campus," Scott said.

Scott said the school's counseling center will help university students who knew Johnson.

"We'll have some grieving on this campus, among the friends of Clint and faculty and staff – myself included," Scott said. "There will be services taking place on the campus to help everybody deal with this."

U.S. troops move against Iraqi insurgents in Baghdad

Army tries to find cause of Black Hawk crash

By Louis Meixler
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Troops flooded a Baghdad neighborhood in a new U.S. military offensive against guerrillas Sunday, as an audiotape purportedly made by Saddam Hussein urged Iraqis to escalate their fight against the occupation.

The U.S. military moves in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq came as the Army tried to determine why two of its Black Hawk helicopters crashed in the northern city of Mosul, killing 17 soldiers in the worst single loss of American life since the war began.

In its offensive, the military fired a satellite-guided missile with a 500-pound warhead at a suspected guerrilla training base, and four insurgents were killed in a separate clash. Both actions are part of an effort to take the fight to the enemy, rather than responding to ambushes and attacks.

"Any of those groups that are working against the best interest of the Iraqis are going to be targeted," said Lt. Col. William MacDonald, spokesman of the 4th Infantry Division.

Strong explosions thundered through central Baghdad after sundown Sunday, apparently part of "Operation Iron Hammer," the new "get tough" strategy.

A large number of U.S. troops, backed by armored vehicles and helicopters, moved into the Sunni Muslim neighborhood of Azamiyah, sealing off a 20-block area and searching vehicles in a show of force.

Meanwhile, the alleged Saddam tape urged Iraqis to escalate attacks against the occupation and "agents brought by foreign armies" – an apparent reference to Iraqis supporting the coalition.

The speaker on the tape, aired on Al-Arabiya television, said the only way to end the chaos in Iraq was for Saddam and his now outlawed Baath Party to return to power.

The CIA said it would review the tape for its authenticity. But President Bush dismissed the recording.

"I suspect it's the same old stuff. It's propaganda. We're not leaving until the job is done, pure and simple," Bush said. "I'm sure he'd like to see us leave, if in fact it's his voice. I know the elements of the Baathist party, those who used to torture, maim and kill in order to stay in power, would like to see us leave."

The voice in the recording resembled Saddam's, but was huskier and the speaker seemed tired.

"The evil ones now find themselves in crisis and this is God's will for them," he said.

The only solution for Iraq, the speaker said, was for "the zealous Iraqi sons, who ran its affairs and brought it out of backwardness ... to return ... to run its affairs anew," he said, referring to the Baath leadership.

FOOTBALL | Fans vindicated with win against NU

and its fans could celebrate.

"What is extremely important to me is that the long-suffering fans of Kansas State University are happy," Coach Bill Snyder said. "A lot of people have been in a great anguish over the years. This is a reward for them."

It is also a reward for the hundreds of players who came before – those who didn't have the chance to walk off the Memorial Stadium turf in victory.

"This is for all the guys who played up here and never won," defensive end Andrew Shull said. "It's just a great day."

K-State and Nebraska (8-3, 4-3) played to a stalemate in the first half. Both teams rolled up more than 200 yards of offense and both missed go-ahead field goals.

Penalties, stout defenses and various miscues kept the scoring to a minimum.

"I thought the players were going to tear the locker room down before the game," Snyder said. "At halftime, it was a little subdued, but the emotion was there."

Despite what the scoreboard read, linebacker Josh Buhl said K-State had the Huskers between the crosshairs at the break.

"I knew it was finished when we came out of the locker room in the second half," he said. "We knew what we had to do."

That's when Roberson and Terry went to work.

After swapping possessions, a Lord fumble set up K-State at the 23-yard line. Four carries later, Roberson scored from 11 yards out to pull the Wildcats ahead 14-7.

"It was major," Snyder said. "That was a big turnover."

Joe Rheem added a field goal late in the third quarter, but it didn't take long in the fourth for Roberson to find Terry – just as he had dreamed.

"It was crazy," Roberson said of the 63-yard play-action touchdown pass. "I had a dream, and I woke out of it throwing a deep pass to James Terry.

"He came open and I made the throw, and he took it into the endzone. I went to the sideline thinking, 'My dream just came true.'"

While Terry didn't know about Roberson's dream, he had one of his own.

"I had a dream last night, too," Terry said. "I caught something similar to the post play for a lot of yards, but I didn't know he dreamed about me."

Less than five minutes later, the duo hooked up again for a 37-yard touchdown to put K-State ahead 31-7.

"I guess they thought we'd just come in and play and let history beat us," Terry said.

A Jared Brite intentional safety was the Huskers' only points of the second half, and an Ayo Saba touchdown run with 1:31 remaining put an exclamation mark on the win.

The victory, K-State's first in Lincoln since a 12-0 shutout 35 years ago, is also the first time in 70 games K-State has beaten a higher ranked team on the road.

"I think it's special for all the Kansas State fans," offensive coordinator Greg Peterson said, "and especially the kids on this team. It's really special."

Darren Sproles ran for 140 yards and a touchdown, Terry hauled in six catches for 175 yards, and the defense held Nebraska to just 77 yards in the second half.

But among all the special performances, Roberson elevated himself to the top.

The senior, in what Snyder called his defining game, threw for 313 yards and two touchdowns while running for 90 yards and a third score.

"It was a defining game," Snyder said. "I saw him do some things from a leadership standpoint I haven't seen before."

And after the game, it was Roberson leading K-State in its salute of the several thousand purple-clad faithful who made the pilgrimage up U.S. Highway 77.

"We all wanted to do it for the fans," Roberson said. "Just to see their faces every time we scored, and how they got up for us, we wanted to bring it home."

ROBERSON | Quarterback backs up talk with play

Roberson's 403 total yards rank sixth on the Wildcats single-game total offensive yardage list.

Coach Bill Snyder said Saturday was a major step for Roberson. Despite the success he's had, winning the big game with the pressure dialed up was important. What impressed the coach even more, though, was the role Roberson took during the week to ensure the Cats' victory.

Roberson spent more time in the office, more time watching tape and spoke in front of his team, trying to make sure that everyone was ready for the biggest game of the season.

"I think what was defining about him, in my eyes, I saw him do some things from a leadership standpoint during the last two or three days that I really haven't seen," Snyder said. "I think he really stepped up in that respect."

Lost in Roberson's second half was the feud with Jammal Lord. Both quarterbacks added to the fire in the week leading up to the game, and it nearly boiled over as the pair met at midfield for the coin toss.

"I told Lord he's a guy who talks a lot of smack, and he didn't want to shake my hand," Roberson said. "So I said 'you want to be like that?' We went at it and had our fair share of talking noise."

Roberson beat the Huskers, and he beat Lord too.

Lord struggled throughout the game, gaining 88 yards on 21 rushing attempts and 98 passing yards on 26 attempts. He consistently over and under threw open receivers and was picked off twice.

"Option teams, option quarterbacks, who's the best? The things they said throughout the week made each other mad," senior Josh Buhl said. "But, if you talk the talk, you've got to walk the walk. Ell did it."

After the game, as players and media rushed the field to catch any exchange between Lord and Roberson, K-State's quarterback was pulled aside for a TV interview. He said winning in Lincoln, breaking the streak and blowing out his critics all felt great.

Then, as he was turning away from the final question, he looked toward the mass of purple, which had swarmed out of the stands and up against an orange retaining wall. The rest of Roberson's teammates were dishing out high-fives and reveling with fans.

"K-State in 'da house," he screamed.

VOLLEYBALL | Team motivated by fan emotions

"We sided out very, very well against a very big, physical team," she said. "As we settled into our side out rhythm, that was huge to us."

The large crowd also proved beneficial to the team – and to Coach Fritz, who had to prepare herself before the match even began.

"It's unbelievable and it's emotional," she said. "When I walked up there for the beginning of the match, I had to get myself composed because I got emotional about how many people had come out to support this team. Our fans have been awesome, but they continue to grow and grow."

With the win, K-State extended its winning streak to 13 matches, and closed in on the Big 12 Championship.

But on Saturday, all the team wanted to do was celebrate – and for a good reason.

"One of the most enjoyable things about coaching is that you get to just sit back and watch your team play well," Fritz said. "And I got to do that tonight."

WOMEN | Team looking to improve for future

Ohlde finished just 2-of-8 from the field, and three first-half fouls limited her playing time down the stretch.

Guard Megan Mahoney also battled foul trouble, getting tagged with two fouls in the first 1:14 of the second half to give her four for the game.

"Obviously she's a huge part of our team," Koehn said, "so having her in foul trouble is going to hurt us a lot."

K-State did manage to work three freshmen into the game in the wake of the foul trouble.

Twiggy McIntyre had six points in 20 minutes, Shanda Murdoch had two points in 11 minutes, and Claire Coggins played eight minutes.

But it was Purdue's freshmen duo who elevated their game. Erin Lawless had six points and Katie Gearlds scored 10 while dishing out six assists.

"She reminds me of Kendra Wecker," Patterson said of Gearlds. "I was really very impressed with her today."

Despite K-State's poor field goal percentage, nine turnovers and an inability to score in the paint, Patterson said plenty can be taken from a loss to a top-10 team.

"We just played a good basketball team and allowed them to exploit us on both ends," Patterson said. "But it is a long season, and it's how you finish that is most important."

OHLDE | Coach disappointed with Wildcats' play

"A lot of times we weren't getting in the right spots," she said. "A lot of that goes to them, but a lot of that goes to me and not making myself present in our offense."

Coach Deb Patterson said, inside and out, Purdue controlled all 40 minutes of the game.

"We did not do a good job at all today inside or on the perimeter. We didn't approach Purdue any differently. We just didn't play Kansas State basketball today. They dictated how we were going to play today."

Senior guard Laurie Koehn, who finished the game with 22 points, 4 boards and no assists, said the lack of a post game altered play outside the paint.

"We were trying to establish our inside game, but they were forcing us into bad outside shots," she said.

While they showed some signs of life, even taking the lead at one point, they were not consistent enough, junior forward Kendra Wecker said.

"We didn't establish any post presence," she said.

MEN | Team confident it will have more success

Martin then stepped up, weaving his way through the lane to hit the game-winning basket.

Global Sports had time for a desperation three-pointer at buzzer, but the shot was off target and K-State walked away with its first victory of the year.

Senior guard Tim Ellis and junior forward Jeremiah Massey led four Wildcats in double figures with 15 points each, while Martin and fellow freshman Dez Willingham contributed 10 points each.

Massey was a force down low for K-State, leading both squads with nine rebounds and a team-best two blocked shots.

He said he is confident the team will continue to improve as the season progresses.

"Every week we play I think we get better," Massey said. "We have been practicing really hard, and tonight showed that if we shoot good shots, it will pay off."

After the game, Ellis was glad to have one in the win column.

"It feels good to get that first win," Ellis said, "but obviously we still need to do some work. Coming down the stretch we slipped a little bit and let them back into the ball game, but for the most part I am happy. We will take this win."

Ellis added that he was impressed with his teammates and said he thinks they are starting to gel together.

"Tonight we played as a team," Ellis said. "We had each member realize and fill the role that they needed to fill."

Foundation investigates need for hotel, parking garage

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a step-by-step process as the possibility of a campus hotel and parking garage moves forward.

The hotel concept envisions a hotel and parking garage built in the K-State Student Union parking lots.

The idea was born when the university administration, along with other academic departments, expressed interest in different types of housing adjacent to campus.

The KSU Foundation was asked to investigate the feasibility of such a project and its effects on the campus and community.

THE HOTEL PROPOSAL

Officials are considering a proposal for a hotel and parking garage adjacent to the K-State Student Union. The Collegian explores, in a five-part series, the implications of the proposal if approved.
Wednesday: How a hotel on campus will affect parking and the Union.

"It's not a project that's underway," Gary Hellebust, Foundation president, said. "We are facilitating this at the university administration's request and helping to investigate a project."

The Shaner Hotel Group was hired to conduct a market feasibility study. They found a need for 125 rooms in a top-end hotel.

"The Foundation did a follow-up study and came up with a very similar finding," Hellebust said.

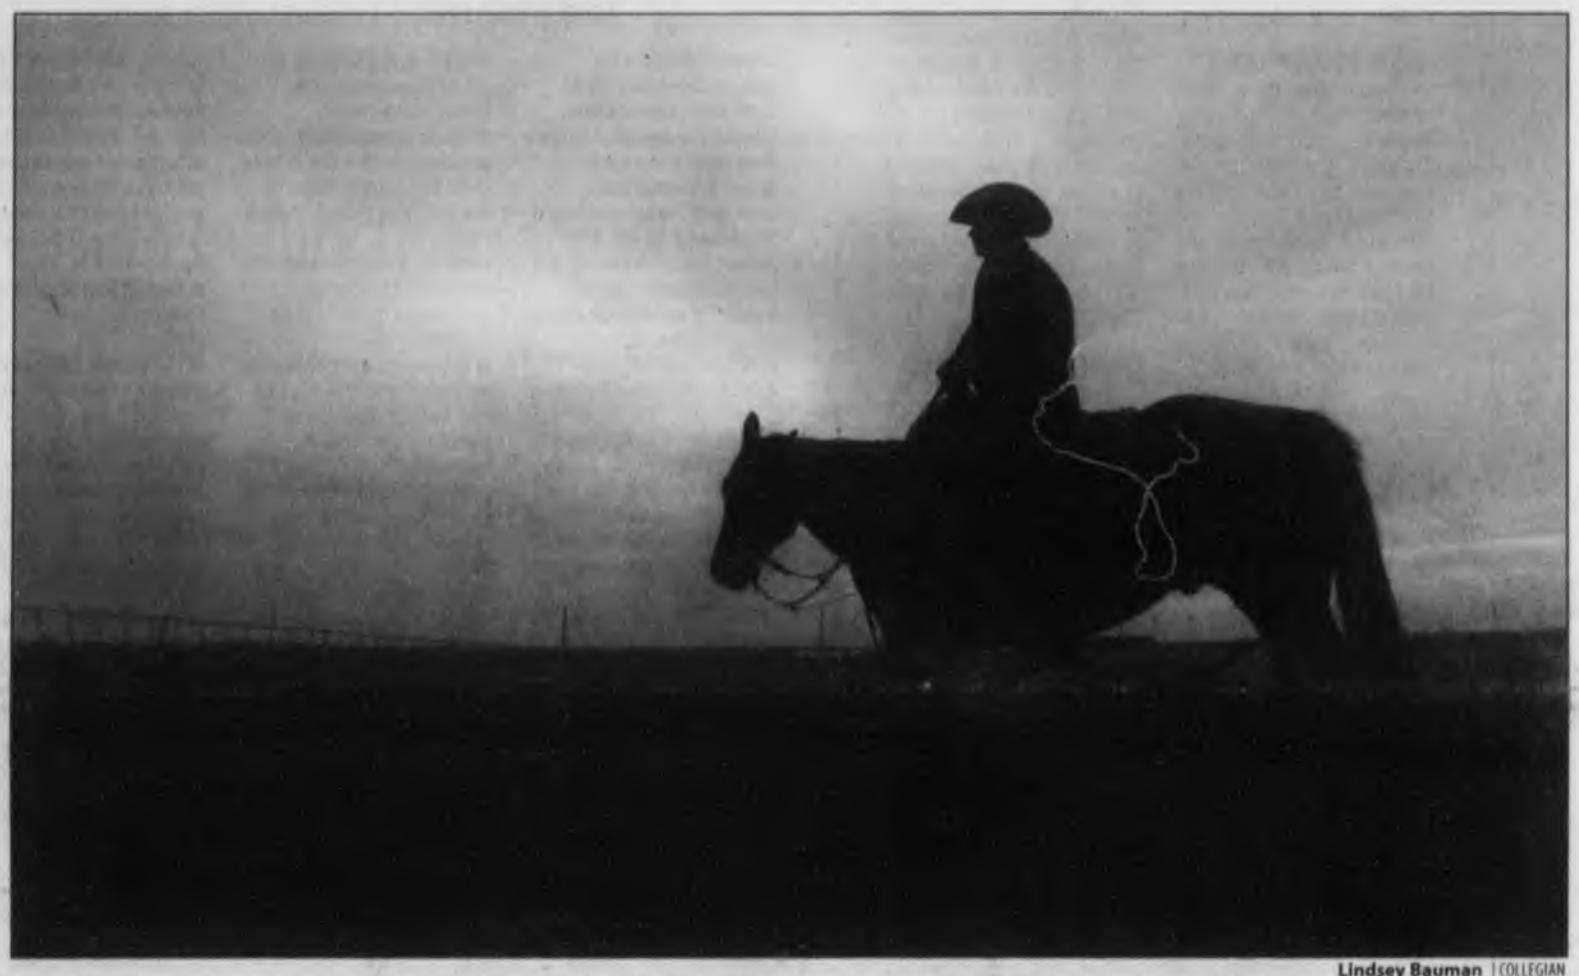
There was a failure in Manhattan to attract conferences primarily based on room shortage, the study showed.

The idea for a campus hotel was born. Mirroring the University of Delaware and Pennsylvania State University's programs, Hellebust said he has been in contact with officials from the Marriott hotel chain.

"The Marriott corporation offers the best academic relationship with the university, as far as we know," he said. "It's safe to say they are curious."

The location was chosen because of its proximity to the Union and Alumni Association – the university's primary conference facilities.

Hellebust said if the concept is developed, the hotel most likely would be a Marriott Courtyard with limited food service. It would be connected to a parking garage, which would add an additional 200 parking stalls for students in the metered and permit lots. The 200 additional student stalls would be in addition to 125 stalls reserved for hotel staff and guests.



The current concept has the garage connected to the Union by sky-walks on at least two levels, Hellebust said.

"It would alleviate a lot of problems," he said. "It would be all-weather parking."

But during the year the parking garage was being built, Hellebust said

Purebred Unit to change after long-standing tradition

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the three and a half years Clint Michaelis has worked at the K-State Animal Science and Industry Purebred Beef Unit located east of Denison Avenue, he said only one aspect has changed.

The paint.

The walls of the barn recently changed from a baby blue and yellow to silver and purple; other than that, not much has changed.

Herding and many chores are still done on horseback and the same types of cattle have been housed since its institution in 1881.

Soon, the unit's traditions will change, which will be a bit more drastic than the paint.

Troy Marple, unit manager and assistant instructor of animal science and industry, said the unit is in the process of merging with a ranch on the outskirts of Manhattan.

"This will continue to be our headquarters, but by merging, we will allow for permanent grazing ground for the cattle," Marple said.

Michaelis, senior in animal science, works with cattle and does chores for the barn. His brother, Rex, junior in agricultural communications, is starting his first semester at the unit and does similar work.

"Being with the cattle and staying outdoors is the best part," Rex said.

Clint said he enjoys the fall, regardless of the slow days and lack of activities.

"In the spring, we are involved with a lot of the calving and our bull sale at Weber Arena. Right now, we have the feeding and everyday chores to deal with. It can get rather slow around here in the fall," Clint said.

Marple said the unit has 325 registered cattle, half of which are black Angus. There are 80 Seminole cattle and 70 to 75 Hereford. He said by winter, half of the cattle will be relocated to the ranch with which the unit has merged.

"The rest of the cattle are scheduled to be moved by this time next year," Marple said.

Marple said there are two student employees and a full-time assistant manager at the merged location. The original unit has eight employees.

"We do everything run of the mill. We babysit the heifers, and I try to expose everyone to as many aspects as they can be," Marple said.

Anthony Rathbun, senior in animal science, gets to experience many aspects on the ranch.

He lives in an apartment inside the barn.

"I'm always on call," Rathbun said. "I call it the heifer check."

He said the decision of who lives in the apartment is based on seniority. He said he works 25 to 30 hours per week and has worked at the unit for two years.

"I was on the waiting list for a while, but then because of my background in ranching, I was selected to become part of the staff here," Rathbun said.

Every first Monday in March, the unit sponsors a bull sale. The bulls are raised on the ranch and sold in Weber Arena.

"We show cattle, but the bull sale is about the only other thing we participate in besides the normal chores here in the barn," Clint said.

Bill Pope, senior in animal science, is experiencing his first semester at the unit. Prior to working there, he was in the animal science barn shop.

"I love it here. There are great guys to work with and lots of diversity," Pope said.

Rathbun emphasized that his involvement with the unit started because of his background with ranches and will soon assist him with job search.

"I'll probably go home and be a cow camp operator. This has prepared me for it," Rathbun said.

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One-half pound of cocaine was seized after five people were arrested and six residences raided Monday.

The arrests resulted in the apprehension of substantial dealers in Manhattan's cocaine market, said Capt. Gary Grubbs of the Riley County Police Department.

The cocaine was assessed at a street value of about $25,000, according to an RCPD press release.

Arrested were Charles Brown, 1116 Gardenway, Apt. B; Naomi L. Phillips, 1116 Gardenway, Apt. B; Crystal Kelly, 3000 Tuttle Creek Blvd., Lot 530; Christina Fernandez, 730 Allen, Lot 32; and Tylesha Pryor, 1030 Gardenway, Apt. B.

DEMON BABIES

LaFayre Marie Banks, 32, was charged with assault and child abuse in Port Huron, Mich., in May after her 7-month-old baby fell from Banks' second-story bathroom window, suffering severe head injuries. Banks told a police officer that she was bathing the child when "it reared up and went through the window."

HIGH-IQ MISHAPS

According to a September safety hearing, British brain surgeon Donald Campbell, 54, crashed his twin-engine plane into a house (he survived, with head injuries) when he ran out of fuel because he miscalculated when converting gallons to liters (Shoreham, England).

An internationally renowned neuroscientist, Patricia Goldman-Rakic, 66, was fatally run over in August while jaywalking, and police said the driver was not at fault (Hamden, Conn.).

LONG SHOT

In July, a judge relented and allowed Richard Quinton Gunn to act as his own attorney in his aggravated-murder appeal, following his conviction earlier in the year in Ogden, Utah, by a jury that deliberated just two hours.

Gunn had confessed, saying he killed his tenant using a crowbar, a butcher knife, a handsaw, a fireplace poker, a 12-inch bolt, a straight-edge razor, an ax, walking canes, a pool cue and a large salad fork.

COMPELLING EXPLANATIONS

In October, U.S. Rep. Cass Ballenger, 76, R-N.C., told the Charlotte Observer that a large part of the stress that ended his 50-year marriage was the entry into the couple's Washington, D.C., neighborhood of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, to a building just across the street from the couple's townhouse, which is three blocks from the U.S. Capitol. Ballenger called CAIR a fund-raising arm of the terrorist group Hezbollah and said he and his wife were terrified at seeing women "wearing hoods" (perhaps meaning headscarves), moving boxes into the building: "(T)hey could blow (the Capitol) up."

DIFFERENT PEOPLE

Loren J. Adams, 40, was convicted in Indianapolis of distributing obscenity in May, based on a business venture that apparently emanated from his admitted interest in watching scenes of bestiality. Not only did Adams' Web site offer videos of people having sex with horses, snakes, etc., but Adams at one time offered to rent out his 3-year-old Great Dane, Tyson, for others' sex videos.

UNDIGNIFIED DEATHS

A 29-year-old, 300-pound man was discovered dead, stuck in a small bathroom window of his home after apparently trying to climb in late at night when he realized he had forgotten his house key (Paterson, N.J., September).

Competition close for couples in Once in a Lifetime wedding

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There's less than one week left.

Voters have four more days to vote for their favorite couple in the Collegian's Once in a Lifetime Plans a Wedding.

The last day of voting is Nov. 21 at midnight.

As of 1 p.m. Monday, Kelly Lynn, K-State alumna, and Aaron Stohs, senior in veterinary medicine, were in the lead with 4,690 votes – about 40 percent of the total votes.

Close behind, though, is Kirby Burke, graduate student in early childhood special education, and David Richard, senior in elementary education, with 4,445 votes, about 38 percent.

Melissa Moyer, senior in animal science, and Christopher Deetjen, K-State alumnus, are in third place with 2,321 votes while Tricia Sanders, sophomore in elementary education, and Joshua Gorden, freshman in agricultural economics, have 233 votes.

Despite complaints about the online voting system, the Collegian's online editor Chris Harrop said the results are accurate.

Complaints arose Wednesday when individuals came to the Collegian reporting that students found a way to vote more than once on a computer.

However, Harrop said the wedding poll is set to prevent multiple votes through both cookies and Internet protocol (IP) blocking.

"Cookies can be deleted – it is one of the most common and basic security measures used in online polls," Harrop said. "IP blocking does not allow votes to be registered from computers that have been used for voting."

As a result, Harrop said, if a computer that has already been used for voting is found in the IP database, the vote is immediately thrown out. In addition, the use of other servers should have no effect on the voting.

"I've tested these supposed methods of voting twice, and none have worked," Harrop said.

Richard said the close race has caused he and Burke to campaign across campus.

"We're definitely campaigning," Richard said. "We've been talking to sororities and fraternities. We've even approached people we don't know."

However, time is running out, he said, which has caused some extra stress for his fiancee.

"At this point, we don't know anyone else to talk to," Richard said. "Kirby is a lot more stressed out than I am. She wanted it so bad."

Stohs said he and Lynn are taking a different approach due to busy schedules this week.

"We'll just see how it ends up," Stohs said. "We've decided that whoever was supposed to win will, and if it's supposed to happen, it will."

The relaxed attitude, though, doesn't eliminate Lynn's stress, Stohs said.

"Kelly sometimes worries about it," he said. "The first day was just stressful. She kept e-mailing me the updates."

Those interested in voting can do so at the Collegian's Web site, www.kstatecollegian.com, then click on the Once in a Lifetime tab.

Students place in finals of singing competition

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Five K-State students placed in the final competition at the national Association of Teachers of Singing competition.

The weekend of Oct. 31-Nov. 2 saw 14 students travel to the University of Nebraska-Kearney for the competition.

Jennifer Edwards, associate professor of music and governor of the West-Central Region, said about 360 students participated representing colleges, universities and private voice studios from Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado and Wyoming.

"There were divisions at the freshman, sophomore, junior, senior, graduate and non-traditional student level," Edwards said.

Edwards said students prepared three selections to be sung at the preliminary audition where they were adjudicated by three judges and given evaluations. They were judged by other teachers from the region.

"If they made a composite score of 90 or above, they advanced to semi-finals," she said.

Ten of the 14 K-State students participating were deemed good enough by judges to perform in the finals.

"The top five student performers in each division advanced to semifinals," Edwards said.

Five K-State students ranging from a freshman to a graduate student made the final elimination, and received a small monetary award and a certificate.

Leia Edwards, graduate student in vocal performance and opera who was a finalist, said because she was a graduate student, the requirements of the competition where somewhat different for her, but overall it was a great experience.

"First and foremost it was an opportunity for vocalists to get a chance to sing in front of different teachers," she said.

She said it's important to hear comments from teachers who aren't used to hearing her voice.

Another finalist, Elizabeth Shuman, junior in vocal performance, said most of the songs she performed were songs she had been working on for quite some time.

"It helps that we get to sing in our seminar class quite a lot," she said. "It's a good thing to sing for your peers and get their input."

She said the competition was a good chance to get to hear other people that were at the same point in their studies.

"There are a lot of really good voices out there and it's good to see where I fit in," Shuman said.

Allison Karnowski, senior in applied music and finalist, had somewhat different reasons for enjoying the contest.

"I got to wear a pretty dress," she said jokingly.

She said she also enjoyed the chance to relax and watch TV in the hotel room.

"There were some really great workshops there, too," she said. "One really great one was about musical theater improvisation and that was really awesome."

Finalist Aaron Grant, freshman in music education, said he was glad to have the experience.

"I got to hear my peers and see how I am comparable to others in the region," he said.

Seth Jones, junior in music education was also a finalist.

Jennifer Edwards said the recent success will help the Department of Music at K-State.

"It's an indication that among music department and collegiate voice areas around the region, K-State is on par with the level of voice teaching that is going on, she said."

The experience, she said, will also help the students build their confidence and learn how they rank amongst their peers.

"It gives them an opportunity to hear students from other colleges and helps them develop an idea of sound and a repertoire," Jennifer Edwards said.

Casino in Junction City still possible

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite a failed vote in Kansas Senate last legislative session, the issue of a casino in Junction City remains prevalent.

This is due, in part, to those who favor an expansion in the state's lottery law. The expansion would allow Geary County residents to vote on a casino in the county.

Rep. Sydney Carlin, D-Manhattan, said the bill was voted on during the last legislative session.

"It passed in the house by a vote of 67-57 but was killed 34-4 in the senate," she said. "I voted for the bill because it allows the people of Geary County to vote for or against it."

Carlin said many different gaming proposals have been presented to the state gambling commission; however, this particular proposal was included in an addition to the state lottery bill.

"The bill would allow for slot machines at existing race tracks in Pittsburgh, Wichita and Kansas City and also included proposals for casinos in Ford and Geary county," she said. "The bill is projected to bring in around $220 to $350 million a year in net revenue."

All proposed measures would alter the lottery bill, Carlin said, which was passed in the early 1990s.

Carlin said proponents of the bill hope to attract visitors to cities like Junction City.

"When we look at the gambling cities, they are absolutely destination cities," she said. "Can we make Junction City a destination city? If we can do those things, then perhaps we want to do that, and perhaps we want to avoid that."

Carlin said she isn't sure if opening a casino would be enough to create such an atmosphere, and Junction City's economic situation directly affects Manhattan's atmosphere.

"This bill is something we definitely have to look at," Carlin said. "I feel it will be a highly charged issue in the upcoming legislative session."

Jack Taylor, Junction City city commissioner, said the state has the final decision on whether the casino will be built.

"We do not know as of this date if (the state) will pass legislation on this matter," he said. "I believe that if the Legislature does allow gambling in casinos, they should allow a vote in counties to see if the residents of the county want it"

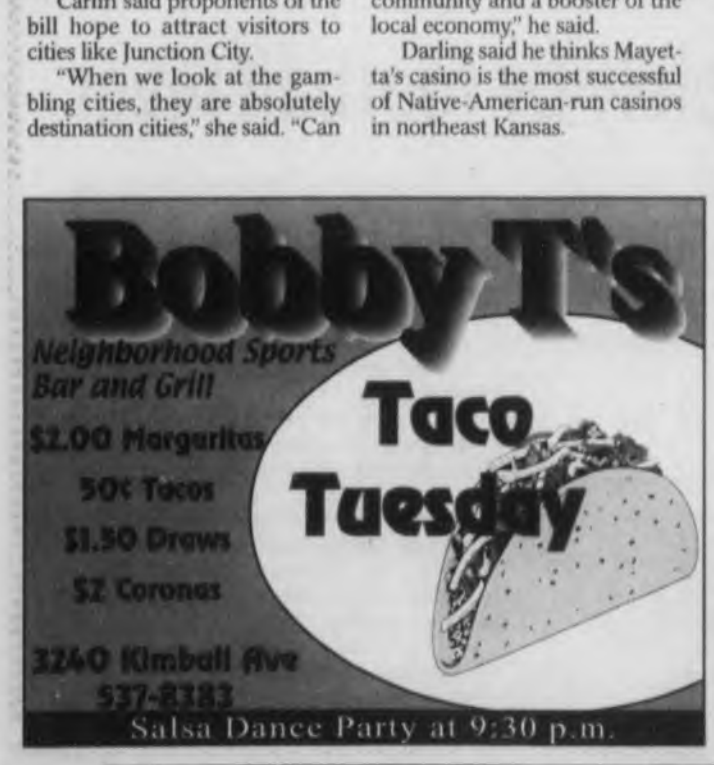
Taylor said he would support whatever citizens of Geary county want.

David Darling, Community Development Economist and professor of agricultural economics, said he was involved in an analysis of a casino run by Harrah's for the Prairie Band Potawatomi Nation in Mayetta, Kan.

"From an economic impact analysis, this particular casino worked out quite well as part of the economic structure of the community and a booster of the local economy," he said.

Darling said he thinks Mayetta's casino is the most successful of Native-American-run casinos in northeast Kansas.

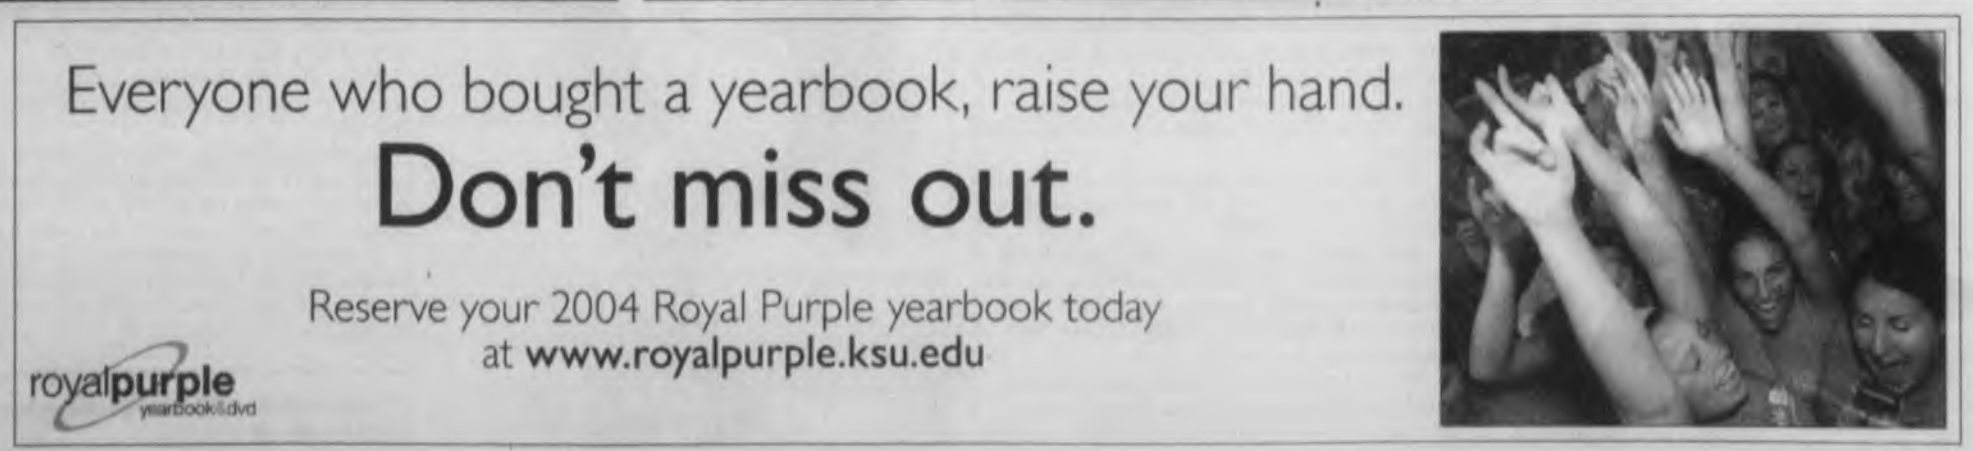
"The Harrah's management has run the casino for the Prairie Band Potawatomi Nation successfully, and it has been a win-win scenario for the management company, the tribal council and the people of the Potawatomi Nation who are benefited through the council," he said.



Darling said the success of the tribal casinos is not a guarantee for success of a privately-owned casino in Junction City or elsewhere.

Because casinos on reservations are owned by people of the tribal nation, the benefits are given to the people and recycled through the reservation economy.

Also, currently all Kansas casinos are located in relatively close proximity to each other. Darling said this is preferred to casinos spread all over the state so people can go from casino to casino.



TO THE POINT

Hotel, parking garage worthwhile if expectations are met

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Collegian editorial board supports the theoretical concept of a hotel and parking garage to be built south of the K-State Student Union, but with several misgivings.

The parties pushing the hotel plan have made many promises that all sound wonderful on paper and will be impressive if the facility meets these expectations, but the question remains: Who will ensure the plans really come to fruition?

When K-State students approved the expansion of the Union Food Court, it was with the understanding that major chains would play a role.

Today, the name brands have been replaced with knockoffs that many students find inferior.

This project will be expensive and, for one year at least, a major inconvenience.

It is worth it if it brings with it more conferences, hotel space, parking, scholarship money and educational opportunities for students.

If these promises are forgotten, though, it will be a great mistake.

One way to alleviate these fears would be for the project's backers to practice better public relations.

More student input and involvement must be solicited. More assurances must be given.

Most importantly, we need a solid guarantee someone will be held accountable if this dream hotel is not all it is cracked up to be.

Whose rights?

U.S. constitutional rights should extend to Guantanamo Bay detainees

JASON HEASER

The U.S. Constitution and the rights held therein are the bulwarks of America and its prosperity.

Along those lines, then, any attempt the United States would take to spread democracy would also entail raising these rights like a banner for other international states to mimic.

It seems, though, that individuals within the Bush administration have decided to exclude a few hundred people from those rights based on some rather shaky prefaces.

Specifically, I believe the foreign nationals being kept at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, under military guard should be given the right of a trial, either by an American court or a world tribunal.

The detainees are suspected terrorist operatives and foreign combatants who have been rounded up, mostly in Afghanistan, since the beginning of the war on terror almost two years ago.

The Bush administration says they are not subject to any rights under the U.S. Constitution or the Geneva Convention because they are held on non-U.S. soil and were captured outside the borders of the United States.

This statement contradicts the very essence of our Constitution and borders on infringing on our already questioned legitimacy in spreading democracy.

The first problem is the differentiation between prisoners of war and unlawful combatants.

This new "unlawful combatant" designation allows the United States to openly hold captured combatants without recognizing them as prisoners of war and thus exclude them from rights under the Geneva Convention.

The problem is that the Geneva Convention, which was ratified by the United States, was revised to not just include war but also any armed conflict between foreign states.

The combat in Afghanistan clearly was an armed conflict, and since "major hostilities have ended," these prisoners should be either tried or repatriated to their home countries.

Obviously, neither of these options has happened and the detainees continue to be kept with only a slim chance for a voice.

The real kicker in this is the Bush administration's blatant ignorance of the rights of individuals and its brushing aside of some of the most democratic documents in history.

The Magna Carta, signed into effect by King John of England in 1215, was one of the first acts limiting the powers of arbitrary executive action. Almost 800 years ago, during medieval times, it was written that "to no one will we refuse or delay, right or justice."

If this concept could be understood by a bunch of inbred barons sweating in armor, why is it so difficult to grasp now?

The U.S. Constitution also includes an amendment that states all prisoners have the right to a fair and speedy trial.

While it is true the detainees are not American citizens, it seems logical that a country attempting to spread democracy and peace would promote the rights to individuals from outside our borders.

This is especially true when, in reading the Declaration of Independence, we can find passages like, "We hold these Truths to be self evident, that all Men are created equal."

Apparently, the Bush administration would rather have said, "All Americans are created equal and thus non-Americans are not entitled to 'unalienable rights.'"

The Supreme Court needs to announce the issue of the "unlawful combatants" is within their jurisdiction and thus take action on the issue, not only for the image of the United States, but also to secure that no individual is above or below the law.

K-State spirit not defined solely by football fever

NASRINA WILLIAMS

Nebraska game? What Nebraska game?

Why does everyone assume all K-State students are football fans?

I do not follow football. I did not choose to attend this university based on the football team.

I do not enjoy being socially stigmatized simply because sports do not provoke my interest.

While I am aware K-State has a very popular and occasionally successful football team, I do not feel anyone has the right to assume I am a fan.

I can't keep track of the number of times I have been asked Wildcat football-related questions by friends, family members and fellow students.

When I reply that I do not like football, I have been met with a variety of reactions.

My friends react with the "oh, yeah, I forgot" phrase that makes it obvious they are still hoping for the redemption of my soul.

Perhaps one day I will find the path of the righteous and learn to appreciate the most sacred of sports.

Although my family has known me for the full 22 years of my life, they still try to talk football with me.

They know I don't really care, but since my parents, younger brother and brother-in-law are all die-hard football fanatics, they take it upon themselves to keep me updated on how "my" team is doing.

It is common for students to have conversations while waiting for class to begin. On Mondays following games and Fridays preceding games this conversation inevitably will turn to football.

I don't mind that they are trying to engage me in football-related conversations, but I wish they would stop looking at me as an outcast because I confess my disinterest in the subject.

Perhaps I misread my admission materials when I applied five years ago, but I am fairly certain an interest in football was not a requirement.

I chose to attend K-State for primarily academic and economic reasons. Is this so wrong? I was under the impression only those planning to participate in college athletics based their decisions upon the athletic programs.

The fact that others enjoy K-State football does not bother me.

We all have our own interests and hobbies.

After all, I don't automatically assume anyone shares my obsession with TV shows created by Joss Whedon.

I understand the football program is a source of revenue for this university. I know tailgating and doing the "Wabash Cannonball" are important parts of the collegiate experience for many of my peers.

Yet I can't help but think there is an overwhelming confusion of priorities.

Does everyone get really excited about the academic achievements of our university?

Will thousands of people travel to support the K-State Rhodes scholarship finalists or a student presenting a paper for a conference?

How often are there news stories in this paper about the academic achievements of the students and staff?

Football games might be a pleasant way to spend one's free time, but future employers are not going to judge the quality of your education based on the performance of the football team.

Football is a fine hobby for those who enjoy it, but there clearly is something wrong when one of the most discussed issues on campus is some football player's eyebrows.

TO THE EDITOR

Columnist lacks sound argument, credibility

Editor,

Grant Reichert's column about Al Franken's performance is, in my opinion, a little off base.

I, too, attended the performance, and while Franken is not as dynamic a speaker or comedian as I'd like, he is funny nonetheless.

The reason I find him humorous is because he actually thinks about what he has to say, instead of coming up with blind reasoning to support his arguments.

It's almost funny the way Reichert wrote his column, in the same format of the people on whom Franken was commenting.

I had to go through three-quarters of the column before I came up with any valid arguments against Franken, and even then I couldn't tell if he liked the performance or not.

Disagreeing with politicians' choices and making fun of Franken's appearance doesn't really do much toward an actual column about the performance, or add to journalistic credibility at all.

You're conservative – that's great, but don't turn an entire piece into an anti-liberal rant.

Focus should be on department's strengths

Editor,

Despite the rave reviews about the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work in the Collegian, I would like to tell the student body the positives about this department.

First, the type of education taught from this department is still top-quality. As with all departments, whether an instructor is great or awful will always come from an opinion.

It is the good opinions that want to be heard, but the bad opinions get published more often. In other words, there probably are more sides to the articles.

Next, as testimony to the department, my education and my ability to express my feelings clearly and intelligently is due to the sociology department.

My complete social awareness of our world, and most importantly, my increased empathy for others is, in part, due to this department.

Last, I applaud the Collegian in exposing the dissenting voices of the student body. In fact, it is ironic that dissension is taught by most of sociology.

In other words, whatever unhappiness or discontent is expressed by the public must be heard, and any quelling of this voice will always be an injustice. But, on the other hand, sociology has taught me to critically analyze anything I read.

Whether it is the Collegian or the New York Times, what we read should not be taken for granted and it must be looked at from other perspectives, particularly when it involves any department at K-State.

Most importantly, I am not trying to save the department, since it never needed rescuing to begin with, but to give a defense to those involved with the department in any shape or form.

Nebraska should not complain about defeat

Editor,

I read with some amusement the reports of Bo Pelini's comments toward Coach Bill Snyder at the end of the K-State versus Nebraska game Saturday.

Pelini apparently was concerned the Wildcats were running up the score by keeping their starters on the field late in the game.

The thought of Nebraska complaining about K-State running up the score has to bring a slight smile to the faces of long-time Wildcat fans who have lived with years of humiliating defeats at the hands of the Cornhuskers.

I remember driving to Lincoln for the 1970 game. K-State had defeated Nebraska 12-0 two years earlier and Vince Gibson's Lynn Dickey-led Wildcats had played the Huskers close in the 1969 loss in Manhattan, 10-7.

With great expectation, we sat in the top row of Memorial Stadium on a cold, windy day and watched Nebraska's Johnny Rodgers run all over the field on the way to a 51-13 drubbing of K-State.

So, for the record, I computed some statistics on K-State-Nebraska scores over the years. The teams have played 88 games, one every year since 1911, except for five years during World War I.

Nebraska owns the overall series, 72-14, with 2 ties, including one K-State forfeit. The average score for all the games is Nebraska over K-State, 27-10.

The most telling statistic is the number of games Nebraska pummeled K-State. Nebraska has defeated K-State 27 times by Saturday's 29-point margin or more.

That's more than 30 percent of the games played between the two teams. Nebraska has won by more than 40 points 11 times and by more than 50 points 5 times.

From 1964 to 1990, the Huskers defeated the Wildcats by an average score of 40-9. That's 27 consecutive games with an average margin two points higher than yesterday's defeat.

So, Nebraska, don't tell us Wildcat fans that we're running up the score. We're just trying to close the gap a little.

Nebraska fans set standard by displaying class, hospitality

Editor,

This weekend I was blessed with the amazing opportunity to travel two hours north to see something that hasn't happened in 35 years.

The K-State football team beat Nebraska on its home turf.

The game was amazing, with its drama-packed first half and sweet K-State domination in the second, and I was front and center the whole time.

Now don't ask me how I fell upon these tickets, but I sat with a friend 16 rows up on the 47-yard line. The two of us were immersed in a sea of red.

I have to say I was a little intimidated while walking down to our seats, but I had no idea how comfortable I would come to be.

When my friend and I sat down some 40 minutes before the game started, not too many people were in their seats, but soon came the nicest fans – no, the nicest people I have ever met in my entire life.

They were two women, a close-to-80-year-old mother and daughter with the mother. As we talked we learned she had been sitting in those same seats since 1923.

Watching this awesome spectacle in Lincoln also prompts me to urge our K-State fans to a higher level of class. That would include showing support for our players at all times.

She's had those tickets for 80 years – every year since the stadium opened.

Well, my friend and I then walked down to the field level and watched our K-State football team run out of the tunnel, which was amazing.

When we came back, our friendly neighbors had bought us stadium seats so we didn't have to sit right on the hard bleachers.

They even invited us to their after-party, but we respectfully declined, especially after the final outcome.

It wasn't just these two who made me look around Memorial Stadium and marvel at how amazing it is. The tradition there is incredible to see, especially when looking at it while standing up in the midst of red-covered bodies sitting down, shaking their heads.

I continued to be stunned by the way the Nebraska fans treated us.

As my friend and I walked around on the field level and among the bleachers, we continually were congratulated by Nebraska fans, not to mention all the people who were so nice in the parking lots before and after the game.

Their grace in losing solidified in my mind that they are some of the best fans in college football.

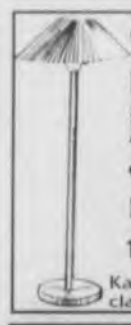
Then there was the purple corner. They were amazing. Their cheering filled the stadium as K-State scored touchdown after touchdown. The K-State fans behaved exceptionally well at the game.

Watching this awesome spectacle in Lincoln also prompts me to urge our K-State fans to a higher level of class. That would include showing support for our players at all times.

Discouragement will come at times, but that should not lead to booing players on the field, especially players like Roberson, when they are the heart of our team.

As fans, we should be good fans in all kinds of weather. It also would include treating visiting fans with respect, for the love of college football and in the interest of building a respectable tradition here at K-State.

If Nebraska fans are the greatest fans in college football, and if Wildcat fans can live up to half their class and dignity, K-State will be well on its way to establishing a rich tradition in the heritage of college football.



I would like to thank all the fans who already are a part of bringing class to the ranks of the K-State faithful.

K-State's performance against Missouri crucial to bowl

Alamo, Independence Bowl officials predict K-State to be among top choices

By Marshall Ice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

What bowl game is K-State going to?

The Cats already have qualified for their 11th straight bowl, but which game they attend depends on how they play during the rest of the season.

If K-State wins against Missouri on Saturday, it will clinch the North division title and a berth in the Big 12 Championship game Dec. 12 in Kansas City, Mo.

However, Rick Hill, vice president of marketing for the Alamo Bowl, said K-State already is an appealing team, despite having three losses.

"Unfortunately, the three-game losing streak hurt their BCS chances," he said, "but they were all close, competitive games with a banged-up quarterback. They are very much in our sights."

If K-State does not qualify for the Big 12 Championship, the Cats' shot at the Alamo Bowl might depend on whether Texas receives the at-large BCS berth.

"The biggest impact is going to be how many schools from the Big 12 are in the BCS," Hill said. "We just kind of have to wait and see if there are two teams in the BCS. If there are, K-State will be the highest ranked team left when we pick."

If the Alamo Bowl is unable to pick K-State, it is likely the Independence Bowl would.

"We have had interest for some time," Independence Bowl Executive Director Glen Kurpica said. "They are a great program with great fans. What has happened there is unparalleled in the history of college football."

Consensus No. 1 Oklahoma already has secured the other reservation at Arrowhead Stadium. If K-State makes it to Kansas City and upsets the Sooners, the Cats automatically would secure a spot at the Fiesta Bowl on Jan 4.

The easiest scenario to determine also will be the hardest one to accomplish.

Intramural sports season nearing a close

By Scot Gammill
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One of K-State's most popular activities – intramural sports – is nearing the semester's end.

Only a few sports remain, including the 3-Point Shootout and the second round of individual sports, which include squash, table tennis, handball, racquetball and the HORSE shootout.

So far this year, the Chester E. Peterson Recreation Complex has seen an increase in the participation among students.

"I think we've done a good job of trying to get our name out there and let students know what's available to them," said Marian Brandenburg, administrative specialist at the Rec Complex. "We've used the K-State e-mail service, students have used our updated Web site, and we've received a lot of coverage about our sports."

With a better turnout, competition has increased among the various leagues at the Rec.

"There has always been intense competition in the fraternity league," Brandenburg said. "But we've also seen the competition level increase in the resident halls, independent league, co-rec and women's divisions."

Intramural sports offer an outlet for students to get involved and utilize their spare time in a constructive atmosphere, she said.

"We think we give them an outlet to continue playing sports in a social atmosphere, and a lot of students use recreational sports as a hobby and a nice way to pass the time."

The top teams in the fraternity division are Tau Kappa Epsilon, Delta Upsilon and Theta Xi.

In the residence hall division, the top-ranked teams are Goodnow 6, Moore 1 and Haymaker 6-9.

The individual sports leaders are TKE-Independent, Big Bodies and Smith House, while in the co-rec league, the points leaders are the Shingles, Goodnow 5 and SSC 1.

In the women's division, the leaders are Alpha Chi Omega, Alpha Delta Pi and Kappa Alpha Theta.

These divisions will be able to continue gaining points next semester by participating in more sports.

Basketball sign-ups begin Jan. 22-29 and play starts Feb. 3. Playoffs will begin around mid-March, which is when sign-ups for softball will begin.

"We usually see a bigger turnout for softball, but both sports are very popular," Brandenburg said.

To get into the playoffs for both sports one must win at least half of its games.

One change that the Rec Complex has made for the spring is the rescheduling of the student golf tournament.

"The fraternity division was the only division able to play in the tournament earlier this semester," Brandenburg said. "Others, like co-rec, women's, independent and residence halls were canceled due to bad weather, but we've set it up so they can now play."

It's all relative

Jensen twins make their mark on the ball court

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At first glance, one might not be able to tell they are sisters, let alone twins.

One stands 6-foot-0, the other at 5-foot-8.

One is an outside hitter, the other a defensive specialist/libero.

But they share a lot of common interests.

They live together. They hang out together. But, most importantly, they play volleyball together.

Cari and Kris Jensen began their volleyball careers at K-State in 2000 after high school careers at Fowler High School in Fowler, Colo.

The fraternal twins played multiple sports in high school – they had no choice with only 98 other students in the school. Despite the state championships in basketball and track and field, volleyball always was their first choice.

"We did club volleyball, and it was always our main one," said Kris, who is older by 22 minutes. "We were always excited when basketball or track came around because it was something different. But volleyball was still always there."

Cari said she and Kris were recognized by college coaches in high school during club volleyball tournaments every weekend across Colorado. Coaches often would come over for home visits and watch the sisters play, which made for a difficult college decision by the time they were upperclassmen.

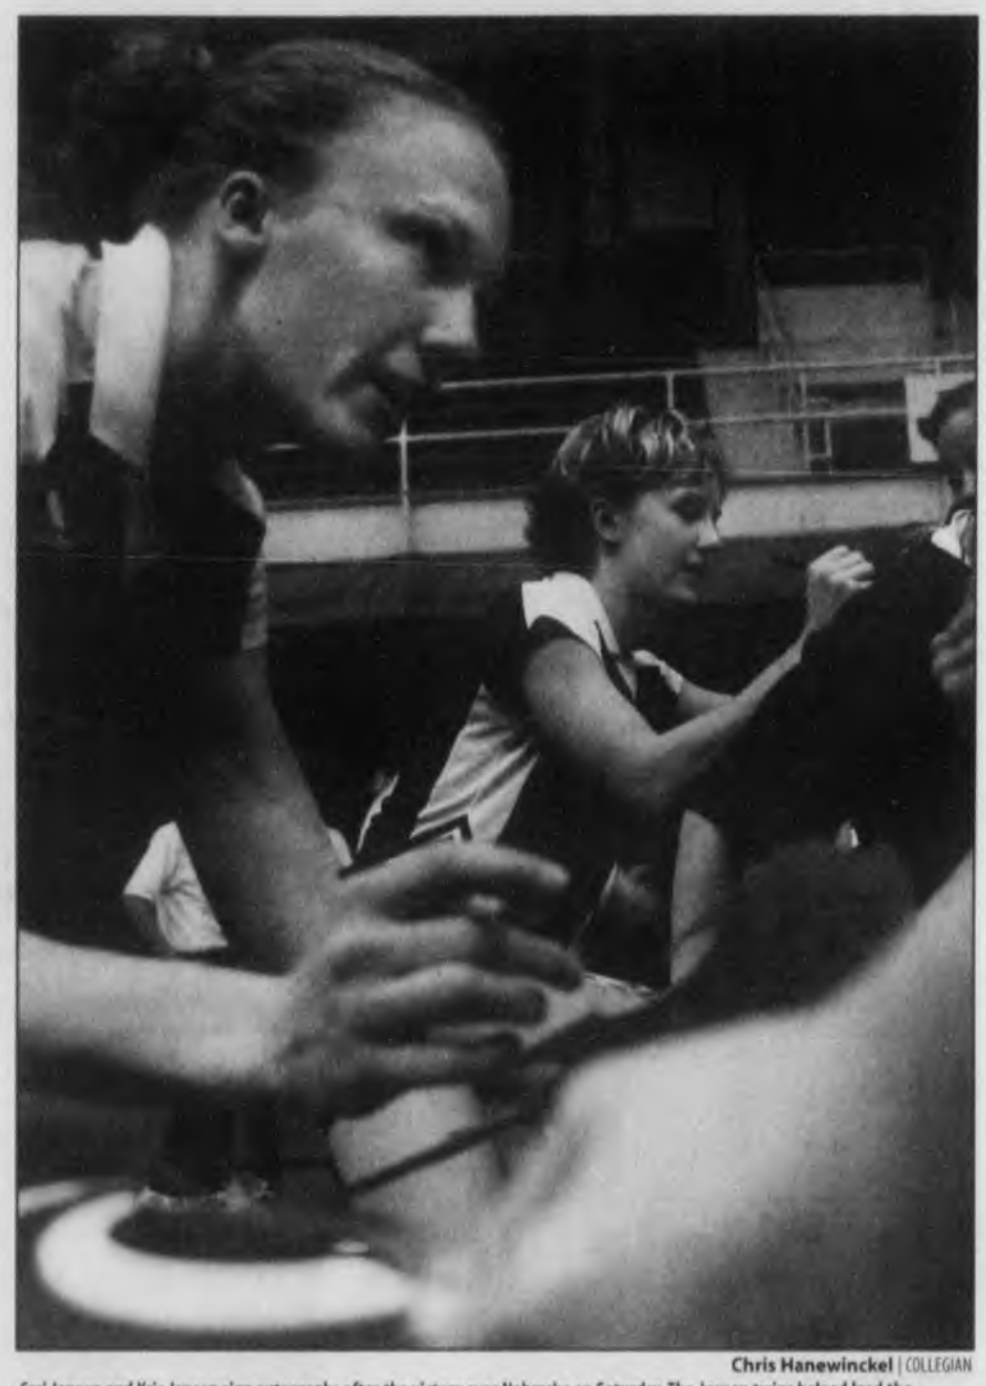
"Kris didn't know where she wanted to go at first," Cari said.

The reason, Kris said, was because she didn't want to hold Cari back.

"She probably could have gone other places, but if I wanted to play, we both wanted to play together," Kris said.

So when K-State offered them both scholarships to play volleyball, they packed their bags and traveled to Kansas.

At K-State, the sisters both have left their mark on a No. 5 ranked volleyball team that is currently first in the Big 12, with a record of 25-3.



Cari, an outside hitter, surpassed 1,000 kills for her career last month against Missouri and averages 2.8 kills per game. Kris, a defensive specialist/libero, averages about 2.1 digs per game. Both were named to last year's Academic All-Big 12 first team.

Both sisters said they never fight, especially on the court.

Now, though, the sisters are preparing to part ways for the first time. Cari is getting married in July and both will graduate next December.

While the separation may be hard, dividing all of their personal belongings may be more difficult.

"Splitting all of our stuff will be the hardest," Kris said. "The car, the computer – that will be the worst."

TCU still undefeated despite lack of respect

JOSH WITT

They are undefeated.

Week-in and week-out this college football team gets the job done at home and on the road.

I'm not talking about the Oklahoma Sooners – it's those Horned Frogs from Texas Christian University.

TCU is 10-0 after Saturday's 43-10 stomping of Cincinnati, but with two games remaining, they're in a bit of a predicament.

They can't seem to get any respect.

Even with one of the higher spots in the Bowl Championship Series standings and a legitimate shot at a BCS bowl if they win, people doubt whether this squad deserves it.

A team from the mid-major Conference USA doesn't have what it takes to be in one of the highest-profile bowl games, the critics say.

Well, the naysayers are absolutely right.

The Horned Frogs have no business being in a BCS bowl, and there is one glaring reason why.

Competition.

They haven't exactly been clashing with the giants of college football this season – more like the midgets.

Battling the likes of Tulane, Arizona, South Florida and Alabama-Birmingham, TCU failed to even win those games convincingly.

In all four contests, the Horned Frogs won by just a field goal, even though each of those teams, besides South Florida, are currently below .500.

The only ranked team TCU has faced thus far is Louisville, who was ranked 25th when they were beaten by – you guessed it – three points.

That's what you get when you play in a league like Conference USA. You don't face the cream-of-the-crop competition.

It is a great accomplishment to be 10-0, and true, it would be outstanding for the program if it finished the season that way. However, when a team playing a soft schedule fails to even convincingly win "easy" games, can it be considered up there with the Oklahomas of the world?

Absolutely not.

An undefeated year with a win versus Louisville as the highlight is not even in the same ballpark as a flawless season consisting of blowouts of top-10 Texas and top-25 Oklahoma State.

Those Army and Houston victories don't quite stack up.

Here's an analogy that might best sum up the comparison of TCU to major-conference teams vying for a BCS bid.

I got a 4.0 first semester last year, and I

Honesty key to healthy relationships

PILLOW TALK

A weekly column discussing the issues of dating, relationships and sex.

RACHEL KRIER

Oh, wise Magic Eight Ball: "Does he really like me?"

Maybe if the Magic Eight Ball were reliable at all, it could help solve all of our relationship dilemmas – just as long as we ask only "yes" or "no" questions.

Question: "Is Tom getting upset with me because he thinks I am too friendly with his friends and my co-workers?"

Magic Eight Ball's answer: "Signs point to yes."

Question: "Will Sarah be pissed at me if I cancel our plans to go out with my friends tonight?"

Magic Eight Ball's answer: "Better not tell you now."

Magic Eight Ball's answer after shaking it a second time: "Ask again later."

So, we all know the Magic Eight Ball is not the place to go for advice on our relationships. However, the Magic Eight Ball isn't the only poor example of relationship counseling. Often times we go to our friends to seek advice when they are no more "in-the-know" than ourselves.

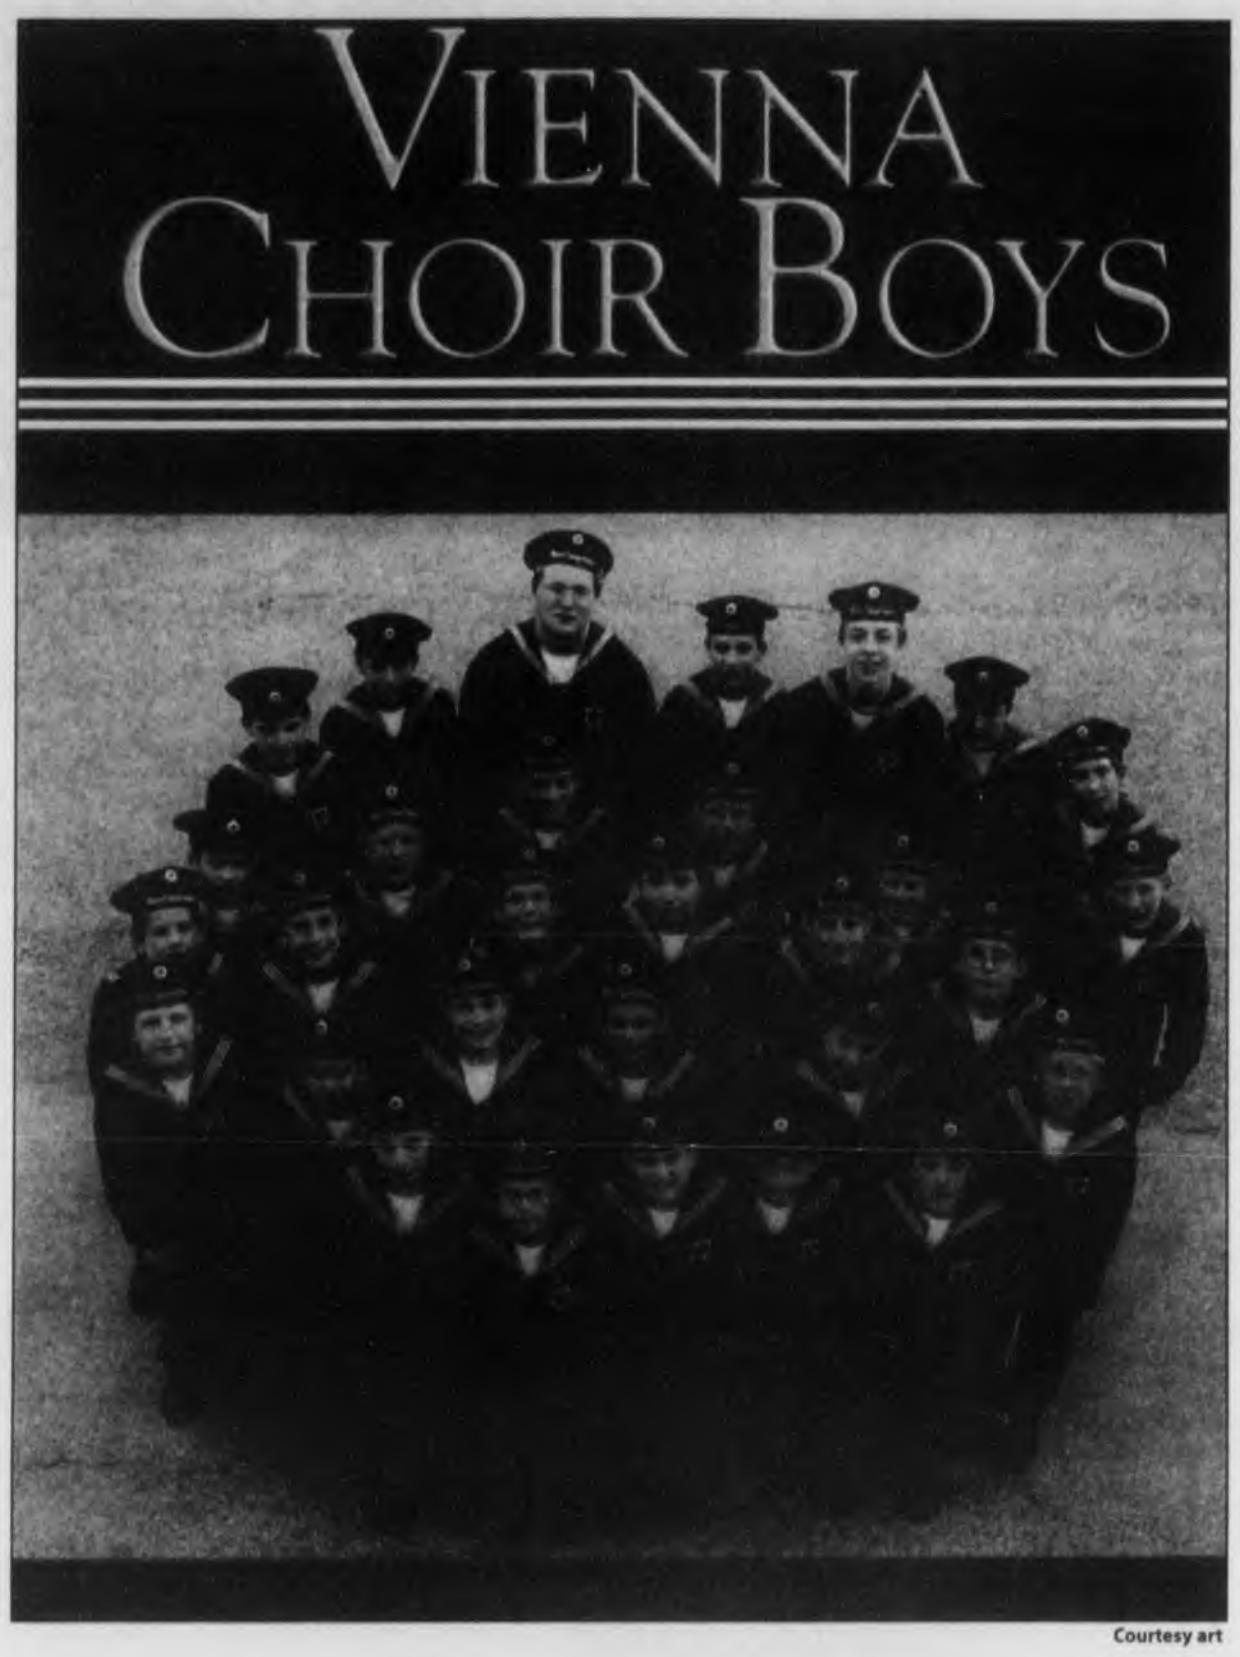
My advice is to not seek advice, but rather simply to talk to the other person in the relationship. If you are wondering whether or not your close-guy buddy shares your desire to be "more-than-friends," then ask him.

All day, we'll sit and ponder the other person's emotions, then stay up in bed at night pondering it some more. We'll talk to our friends about it, but, honestly, how much insight do they have? Sure, they might have gone through a similar experience last semester, but that really has little to do with your situation.

To all those guys out there who aren't trying to dupe a girl into bed, be honest and very clear with the lady or ladies in your life. Tell a girl when you are interested in her and tell her your intentions.

It's dangerous to think everything is understood and there doesn't need to be any discussion. Better to risk embarrassment in the beginning than to face heartbreak in the end.

Of course, the same applies to women. Be honest and clear in your relationships, both with your friends who are boys and your boyfriend.



Tell a guy when he upsets you and why he upsets you. This also might help you to realize when you are getting upset over petty things when you hear yourself sounding so silly. Just remember: nobody likes a psycho-hoz-beast.

Honesty and clarity alone will not solve all your relationship woes. There is such a thing as being too honest, and your delivery always makes a big difference. For instance, you can tell someone you're not interested without telling them that the way they chew their food like a cow makes you want to vomit.

This is college – it's about time we leave the high school drama back in high school.

World-renowned boys choir to make appearance in Manhattan for 4th time

By Lauren Morano
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The last time they were in Manhattan was in 1998. The Vienna Choir Boys are making their fourth appearance in Manhattan at 7:30 tonight at the First Methodist Church.

Anyone who has seen these boys perform live knows what to expect.

"Watching these boys perform is like going to a famous museum," Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said. "They are polished singers who give a very fine concert."

"For some, watching these boys perform is a once-in-a-lifetime event."

The visiting choir is one of four touring choirs composed of about 100 boys between the ages of 10 and 14. There are about 25 boys in each choir, with each group presenting about 300 concerts a year.

Having four different choirs is necessary, due to the high demand from people wanting to see the performers on stage. Also, the young singers don't have the stamina to sing night after night, Martin said.

Austria's Emperor Maximilian I, who requested that six boys always be among his court musicians, started the choir in 1498. Throughout the 500 years the choir has been together, it has gone through some hard times but always managed to pull through.

Beginning in kindergarten, 250 boys and girls are given a musical and general education, and the most talented boys are selected to join the choir at age 10. The boys then enter the choir's grammar school and are tutored while they are on the road, Martin said.

The choir is considered one the the most famous choirs in the world and has put on concerts in countries from Latin American to South Africa.

"An all-boys choir is a rare thing," said Jennifer Edwards, chairman of the voice division in the Department of Music.

During the concert, the boys will be performing different types of works, such as religious, secular, international folk songs and Christmas tunes.

Although the boys usually sing in Austrian, they also will be performing songs in Latin, German, French, Hungarian and English, Martin said.

The only accompaniment is a pianist, who directs the choir from the piano.

The concert is taking place in the First United Methodist Church because the performance date coincides with the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance and music department's performance of the musical, Company. The musical does not open until Nov. 20, but the set is already up, and we didn't want to have to break it down, and then put it back up after the performance, Martin said.

For Price Messick, sophomore in theater, this will be his first time seeing the choir live.

"I've been involved with many boys choirs, and the Vienna Choir Boys are one of the best.

"I've always enjoyed the voice of a good-sounding choir, and this choir has always put on great shows for their age."

Being one of the best choirs in the world takes a lot of hard work –the boys have to leave their families behind and devote everything to going to school and practicing, Messick said.

Martin, who is responsible for booking for McCain, has nothing but praise for the choir.

"These boys are charming youngsters who sing incredibly well," Martin said.

Edwards also has seen the choir perform before and has similar feelings as Martin.

"They are a long-standing performance organization and a wonderful choir."

"The concert is worth any penny that a person would pay," she said.

Cat in the Hat returns

You don't put a leash on a cat. That was the philosophy the filmmakers followed to transform the simple whimsy of the Dr. Seuss storybook "The Cat in the Hat" into a candy-colored, in-your-face comedy starring Mike Myers as the mischievous feline in a towering red-and-white cap.

Egan doubles up on jobs

On a typical winter weekend, Dan Egan might be showing daredevils how to jump off a cliff or ski down a glacier in some remote part of the world, or at a ski area near you.

Egan is the general manager of a small ski area, Tenney Mountain, but he leads a double life as one of the top extreme skiers in the world, and he's spreading the word to future generations.

"We'll push you to the freak-out level and beyond," he said.

Name causes controversy

The folks on Crapo Street are a little unhappy with their address.

Although the Oakland County street is pronounced 'Kray-po', most people call it 'Krapp-o' and the embarrassment has prompted residents to ask for a new name.

Highland Township Trustees — intent on honoring former Michigan Gov. Henry Howard Crapo, for whom the street is named — agreed to ask for a change to Governor Crapo Street.

Workshop to offer scholarship advice

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Running out of money? Don't know when to apply for aid?

They've got answers.

For the seventh year, Adult Student Services and Student Financial Assistance will be host to the K-State Scholarship Workshop. The Union Program Council is beginning its fifth year of involvement.

Nancy Bolsen, director of Adult Student Services, said there is an expo between 5:30 and 6 tonight. She said it is a good opportunity for students to browse the scholarship opportunities K-State and the Manhattan community offer.

"Individuals from the different colleges, and people with local scholarships will be there. There are also computer stations for students to apply online," Bolsen said.

She said there is a presentation scheduled between 6 and 7 p.m., and information about federal application for student financial aid, but the majority of the workshop will focus on scholarships.

She said scholarship scams, types of scholarships and essays will be topics of discussion.

"We'll talk about the essay and tailoring it when it is required for the application process," Bolsen said.

"Reference letters and transcripts will be talked about, and we will finish with how scholarships pay off."

In addition to the free information about scholarships, two $200 scholarships will be awarded to participants at tonight's workshop.

Bolsen said that when students enter the ballroom, they will fill out information slips that later will be drawn for the two winners of the scholarships. Students must be present to win.

If you go
Scholarship Workshop
When: 5 to 7:30 tonight.
Where: Union Ballroom.
How much: Free.

Bolsen said the Adult Student Services and Student Financial Assistance offices have invited students who are continuing education at K-State and local area high school students through their counselors.

"I'm sure there will be a large mix of people present. We've had quite a few parents in the past and plan to see just as many this year," Bolsen said.

She said the attendance for the event has stayed steady over the past six years at about 300 to 350 students.

Bolsen said the window of opportunity for scholarships is from November to April and that the workshop is a great opportunity for students to get scholarship applications.

"When you're here at K-State, we look at your record, but scholarships outside K-State have a variety of requirements – grade point average and financial need are examples," Bolsen said.

"For other scholarships, they are open to interests, for non-traditional students, for community service and many other interests."

Bolsen said she encourages students to attend the workshop.

"This is a great opportunity for students to get connected to scholarship opportunities and the process of applying for scholarships," Bolsen said.

"It's a great reminder to apply for K-State general scholarships for the next school year."

Committee hears testimony to keep records closed for employee safety

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – State and local officials told a legislative committee Monday that government agencies ought to be allowed to close some records to the public to protect the privacy and safety of employees.

"I'm sure there are drug dealers and terrorists who would like to get photos of our undercovers," said Assistant Attorney General Kyle Smith, a spokesman for the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

"All that's in our personnel records."

The Special Committee on Local Government opened two days of hearings Monday on exceptions to the Kansas Open Records Act.

Under a 2000 law, all exceptions will be repealed automatically on July 1, 2005, unless the Legislature takes action to keep them in effect.

Besides state and local officials, several representatives of news organizations also planned to testify.

The Open Records Act generally requires agencies to make their records available to the public but it contains 46 exceptions.

In addition, another 324 exceptions are sprinkled throughout other Kansas laws.

One exception allows government agencies to close most of the information in their personnel files.

State and local government representatives said the policy remains a good one.

"Personnel records contain sensitive and personal information about individuals who should not lose their basic rights of privacy simply because they seek public employment," said Mark Tallman, a lobbyist for the Kansas Association of School Boards.

Like Tallman, Mike Mueller, employment manager for Sedgwick County's Department of Human Resources, said information such as employees' home addresses and names of their spouses and children are private matters.

Furthermore, he said, employees fear that releasing information from their personnel files make them more vulnerable to identity theft.

Tallman said sometimes information in personnel files deals with allegations that turned out to be unsubstantiated.

He said school boards should be able to consider such allegations without having an employee convicted in the public eye.

"There's a reason those exceptions are written in, and we need to remember why," Smith said.

Italian official criticizes U.S.-led coalition in Iraq

By Robert H. Reid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – An Italian member of the U.S.-led coalition has resigned, accusing the Bush administration of inefficiency and failing to understand Iraq. In Tikrit, U.S. forces killed six alleged insurgents as they pressed their search Monday for a former Saddam deputy believed to be orchestrating attacks on Americans.

Before quitting, Marco Calamai, a special counselor of the Coalition Provisional Authority in the southern province of Dhi Qar, criticized L. Paul Bremer's administration for its handling of Iraq. The charges come as Russia and France objected to the U.S. timetable for handing over power to the Iraqis by July 1.

Rising casualties added new urgency to the task. Three more American soldiers died Monday in separate attacks north of Baghdad, one in an ambush on a patrol, the other by a roadside bomb.

Military spokesman Brig. Gen. Mark Kimmitt said the U.S.-led coalition attacked dozens of suspected guerrilla hideouts as it intensified a search for Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, No. 6 on the most-wanted list of 55 Iraqis and former vice chairman of Saddam's Revolutionary Command Council.

In addition to the killing of the six suspected guerrillas, Kimmitt said coalition forces had captured 99 suspected insurgents, including a former general in Saddam's elite Republican Guard, during 1,729 patrols and 25 raids conducted over the past 24 hours.

For the second time in as many days, American troops fired a satellite-guided missile with a 500-pound warhead, this one at a suspected insurgent sanctuary 10 miles south of Tikrit, Saddam's hometown.

"Clearly, we're sending the message that we do have the ability to run operations across a wide area," said Lt. Col. William MacDonald of the 4th Infantry Division. "We have overwhelming combat power that we will utilize in order to go after groups and individuals who have been conducting anti-coalition activities."

In Rome, the Italian Foreign Ministry confirmed Monday that Calamai had resigned but gave no reason.

The Italian government of Premier Silvio Berlusconi was a strong supporter of the United States during the war and deployed a 2,700-strong peacekeeping force to help rebuild the country. But In an interview with the leftist daily L'Unita, Calamai complained that the British and Americans had marginalized the Italians. "They don't consult us, they don't involve us."

Calamai said only an interim authority headed by the United Nations could turn things around.

Calamai told the Italian reporters in Nasiriyah on Sunday that the failure of the coalition to understand Iraqi society had created "delusion, social discontent and anger" among Iraqis and allowed terrorism to "easily take root." He cited last week's truck bombing at an Italian paramilitary garrison in the city, which killed 19 Italians and 14 others.

Calamai said about $400,000 a month was supposed to be made available for projects in Dhi Qar province alone but "because of the muddled organization of (the coalition), only a fraction has been spent."

"The provisional authority simply doesn't work," Calamai told the newspapers. He said only a U.N. administration could turn the tide.

There was no immediate comment from Bremer's staff.

State Department spokesman Richard Boucher, asked about Calamai's resignation, said the coalition authority has made "excellent progress" in several areas, including "the physical reconstruction of Iraq, the restoration of services to Iraqi people, the beginnings of political authority among the Iraqi ministers and now an accelerated path to political authority."

In Washington, President Bush met with a small group of Iraqi women on Monday and promised the United States would not pull out of Iraq when a provisional government is established.

"I assured these five women that America wasn't leaving," Bush said. "When they hear me say we're staying, that means we're staying."

HOTEL | Campus aesthetics a factor in proposal

officials have discussed a shuttle system from the Bramlage Coliseum parking lots, as well as continuing the existing shuttle system from the Foundation building at 2323 Anderson Ave.

"It has to be economical and safe," Hellebust said. "That's the two priorities we would demand."

Julie Lea, Foundation communications director, said traffic naturally would be congested during the construction phase, but it isn't anything that can't be accommodated.

"We are going to have to go around," Lea said. "When the library was being constructed, it still continued to function. Students still had access to the services. We would survive."

One of the concerns has been whether the hotel would hide the Union and if the appearance of a parking garage would blend in with campus architecture.

Hellebust said architects have drawn up plans that fit both the hotel and garage into the campus scheme.

"We are very much aware we need to have the university maintain its presence," he said.

If the current architecture theme could not be maintained, Hellebust said the project would not continue.

"If the cost with making it aesthetically pleasing would put it out of reach, we won't go forward," he said.

Hellebust met with the Board of Regents in October to ask permission for a land swap. Because the current parking lots are owned by the state of Kansas, the Foundation would have to petition the Kansas Legislature to sell the land.

"If this moves forward, we would purchase the property from the state for its appraised market value," Hellebust said.

The hotel would be financed by commercial loans or revenue bonds. Hellebust said he doesn't anticipate the students' pocketbooks would be affected.

"Student privilege fees are an area that the student leadership is concerned about," he said. "We don't foresee those would be impacted."

Lea said the hotel would not harm existing hotels' business but only help the overall economy. Foundation officials will meet with local hotel owners within the next two weeks for the first time.

"If Manhattan can add rooms to attract conferences, one hotel won't serve all the patrons. There could be a positive impact for the whole community," she said.

Lea said conference patrons also would be eating and shopping at businesses in the community, as well.

Hellebust said they will continue to meet with campus groups like Student Senate and Faculty Senate, as well as city organizations. The next step in the process is to evaluate the construction and operational costs of the hotel.

It's important to remember, however, the proposal is not a definite plan, Hellebust said.

"It's just a concept, and we are taking it one step at a time," he said.

BOWL GAMES | Cotton Bowl a possibility for Cats

If K-State loses to Oklahoma, the so-called K-State rule, which ensures the loser of the Big 12 Championship game falls no farther than the Alamo Bowl, would only help the Cats.

Assistant Big 12 Commissioner Bo Carter said K-State currently does not meet the criteria for the rule to apply.

"They have to have nine wins and be in the top 12 of the BCS," he said.

After taking Big 12 runner-up Colorado last season, the Alamo Bowl is exempt from taking the title game loser for the next three seasons.

Cotton Bowl President Rick Baker said K-State is on the short list of schools being considered for the Jan. 2 contest.

"Certainly, K-State is on our radar screen," he said. "They have great fans, and we have the utmost respect for Tim Weiser and Bill Snyder. We have had terrific games when K-State has been in the Cotton Bowl."

K-State Sports Information Director Garry Bowman said scouts from almost every bowl with a Big 12 tie-in have attended at least one K-State game.

Despite K-State's favorable fan support, the Cotton Bowl has not officially sent scouts to see the Wildcats play this season.

"I'd like to see the Cotton Bowl have more interest in us," Bowman said, "but I think they are pretty interested in Oklahoma State.

"Obviously, the best case scenario is the Fiesta," Bowman said. "The worst case scenario is probably the Alamo Bowl."

was happy. It was the best I could have done.

But what does that really mean? Am I one of the smartest students on campus?

Uh, no.

And why not?

Because there are several thousand people on this campus with schedules much tougher than mine.

Granted, I had a few big victories in American Presidency and Abnormal Psychology, but come on.

Do those A's really stack up with the engineering majors, or architecture majors or anybody who's taking Calculus 1000 or Biochemical Understanding of Genetical Patterns 900?

Not even close.

If I were an engineering major, my GPA would have been more like 0.4 instead of 4.0, and I'd be going to a Tony Robbins seminar looking for answers to my life.

See the connection?

Save those BCS spots for teams who have gone through the rigors of major-conference play, not one whose hardest matchups have been against the "100-level course" teams.

Actually, leave TCU out for the sake of their own pride.

If they do get a BCS berth and face the best, it could get very ugly.

It would be like me if I were to take Calculus.

I could fake like I belonged for a little bit, but it wouldn't take more than two minutes to realize I just didn't belong.

DRUGS | Cocaine sales still a regional problem resulted in the apprehension of some of Manhattan's substantial dealers of cocaine, in part, because some of the individuals had been arrested previously for similar charges.

Brown was arrested in September for distribution of cocaine, while Pryor was arrested in April for sale of opiates.

The pre-dawn searches were a joint effort by the RCPD, Kansas Highway Patrol, Kansas Bureau of Investigation, Pottawatomie County Sheriff's Department and Wamego Police Department.

The searches included many regional law enforcement agencies because the problem of cocaine sales is not solely a Manhattan problem, Grubbs said.

"This is a regional problem," he said. "A lot of this cocaine probably was going to other areas."

Authorities also searched 1030 Gardenway, Apt. B, 708 Frey and 930 Fremont St., the press release said.

The two Gardenway addresses were searched simultaneously, and the other addresses followed, Grubbs said. Tactical teams led the searches, while the Highway Patrol's drug-sniffing dog was used at each of the residences.

Most of the cocaine was seized at Kelly's address at 3000 Tuttle Creek Blvd., Grubbs said.

A small amount of marijuana and a 1997 Pontiac also were seized. The owner of the automobile has not been identified or arrested, Grubbs said.

Pryor and Fernandez were released on bond, while the others were in RCPD custody Monday afternoon.

Brown, 22, was arrested for possession of crack cocaine and marijuana with intent to distribute, possession of drug paraphernalia and no drug tax stamp. He was held on $100,000 bond.

Phillips, 23, was arrested for possession of crack cocaine and marijuana with intent to distribute, possession of drug paraphernalia and no drug tax stamp. She was held on $40,000 bond.

Kelly, 21, was arrested for possession of crack cocaine and marijuana with intent to distribute, possession of drug paraphernalia, child endangerment and no drug tax stamp. She was held on $75,000 bond.

Fernandez, 24, was arrested for possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, possession of marijuana, possession of drug paraphernalia, child endangerment and no drug tax stamp. She was released on $40,000 bond.

Pryor, 19, was arrested for possession of marijuana and possession of drug paraphernalia. She was released on $1,000 bond.

others were crying.

The jury deliberated for siz and a half hours before convicting Muhammad of two counts of capital murder. One accused him of taking part in multiple murders, the other – the result of a post-Sept. 11 terrorism law – alleged the killings were designed to terrorize the population. Muhammad is the first person tried under the Virginia law.

Muhammad was found guilty of killing Dean Harold Meyers, a Vietnam veteran who was cut down by a single bullet that hit him in the head Oct. 9, 2002, as he filled his tank at a Manassas gas station. He also was found guilty of conspiracy to commit murder and use of a firearm in a felony.

The victim's brother, Robert, said he believes Muhammad deserves the death penalty.

Police interview K-State students in Lawrence murder

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Authorities from Douglas County have followed more than 80 leads, including some in Manhattan, regarding the apparent homicide of Carmin Ross-Murray, officials said.

Ross-Murray, the former director of K-State employee relations and former Manhattan city prosecutor, was found dead in her home north of Lawrence on Friday.

Lt. Kathy Tate of the Douglas County Sheriff's Office said Tuesday that roadblocks were placed in Ross-Murray's neighborhood and investigators are still on the scene working.

Ross-Murray's ex-husband, Thomas Murray, is an English professor at K-State.

Some of Murray's students had been contacted and interviewed by the Douglas County Sheriff's office, but police would not confirm any aspects of the investigation.

Linda Brigham, interim head of the Department of English, said Murray took a personal leave Monday and will take another today.

Football team to honor Armstrong at game Saturday

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football team will remember the K-State student who was killed in car accident Friday at its game Saturday.

Kevin Armstrong, junior in economics, was killed on his way to the football game in Lincoln, Neb., when the car he was a passenger in hit an oncoming car Friday evening. Three other students were injured in the accident.

Coach Bill Snyder fought back tears at a press conference Tuesday when he recalled how he had spoken with Armstrong's family about their son's dedication to K-State football.

Highway Patrol is asking for eyewitnesses who can identify the vehicle responsible for the fatal accident over the weekend. See story, Page 5.

"I did visit with the family – wonderful people," Snyder said. "Sean (Snyder) called and asked if they would allow us to wear an emblem on our headgear in his honor. His mother told me what a great fan he was – a young guy who just loved Kansas State football. She was honored that we would do that and shared with me that she was certain he'd be smiling on that given day."

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics also sent flowers to Armstrong's funeral Tuesday afternoon.

A universitywide memorial service is scheduled for 4 p.m. Friday in All Faiths Chapel.

Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities, said representatives of many different organizations would be speaking at the service.

"Kevin was involved in many groups," Fallon said. "He was well-known and very popular on the campus."

Faculty from the Department of Economics will be speaking, as well as someone from the Leadership Studies program. Students from KSU Navigators, a Christian organization, also will

Hotel and parking garage would require changes to current services

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The addition of 200 parking stalls on campus sounds exciting.

But the extra parking space comes with a cost. K-State Parking Services officials have begun hammering out the details if the concept for a hotel and parking garage on campus is approved.

The proposal, now being investigated by the KSU Foundation, calls for a hotel and garage being built in the existing K-State Student Union parking lot.

During the garage's construction phase, which would last about a year, 400 parking stalls would be removed, Darwin Abbott, Parking Services director, said.

"We have already talked about running a bus system back and forth to the area," Abbott said. "We haven't done a huge amount of talking with Bramlage, because we don't have a lot of details. It would be our expectation that we would go from our lots in the northwest area and run a bus system down to the Union."

Abbott said the details of the shuttle route would depend on which streets were accessible during construction. However, he said the shuttle would be convenient and would come at no extra cost to faculty and students.

"There are some people that just get off on sitting there in the West Stadium lot waiting for somebody to leave," he said. "Even if we are down 200 stalls, that is going to be an impact. A lot of people traveling from the north might want to just stop and ride the shuttle. I don't think it will be huge inconvenience."

BUSH APPROVES NEBRASKA FLOOD RELIEF

WASHINGTON, D.C. – President Bush approved $247 million in disaster relief and aid for Nebraska after the state was stricken by intense flooding Saturday night.

According to experts, the cumulative tears of the state's many Cornhusker fans caused as much as three-foot flooding in some areas, following the University of Nebraska's historic butt-whooping by K-State.

Flooding has receded in some areas, leaving behind crusty salt deposits on cars and in homes.

DINING CENTER ORGANIZES DRIVE

"Hall staff members felt this would be a great way to serve the less needy," Scott Fujita, Goodnow Hall Community Assistant, said.

The drive will last from Wednesday to the end of the semester. Certain clothing items are specifically desired.

"Really, this is just a way for us to stop people from wearing shorts with screen-print on the rear," said Fujita. "I'm really sick of seeing people parade around. Those things scream 'Look at my ass!'"

SURGEON GENERAL STRESSES ATKINS PLAN

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Vice Adm. Richard H. Carmona, the surgeon general of the United States, recommended Tuesday that every American who is more than 50 pounds overweight immediately begin an Atkins Plan diet.

This announcement was made after several thousand Americans succumbed to implosion.

Scientists say the process is similar to the creation of neutron stars and black holes. When a star becomes excessively massive, it collapses in on itself and turns into a infinitely dense neutron star or quantum singularity.

Likewise, the unfortunate victims reached critical mass and collapsed in on themselves, becoming infinitely dense.

Carmona explained, "The plight of the excessively obese has become even more serious when infinite density is factored into the equation. These people not only pose a risk to themselves, but also anyone caught in their event horizon.

"Therefore, we need to take immediate action to prevent any more catastrophes."

POLICE RAID NEVERLAND RANCH; IRAQI WMD FOUND

SANTA BARBARA, Calif – Tuesday's police raid of pop superstar Michael Jackson's Neverland Ranch has led authorities to a cache of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction.

U.N. weapons inspectors accompanied a SWAT team after a chemical factory bunker was discovered underneath one of the ferris wheels on the amusement park located on the ranch.

When notified of the discovery, British Prime Minister Tony Blair [Username: HotBrit110] instant messaged President George W. Bush [Username: TXT0AST2000], saying "OMG d00d, u wil not beleive th1s!!!!" The message was followed by five minutes of exchanged smileys.

Jackson could not be reached for comment, but his personal assistant – Jonathan Lipnicki – informed a conference call of reporters that "the human head weighs eight pounds."

MUSLIM | 17-year Manhattan resident strives to incorporate religious beliefs into family, school, social lives

what frustrating. She said that in Iraq, employees are corrected immediately if they do something wrong, but this is not the case in the United States.

"Here, it's like if I do something they don't like, they don't tell me, 'that's not right.' They don't discuss it – there's no second chance," she said. "They tell you, 'well, sorry,' and smile in your face, and inside they just hate you, but you don't know."

She said the classroom environment is different as well. She said Iraqi classrooms are louder, but that she thinks Iraqi students show more respect to professors.

"They (Iraqis) argue, they talk in the class – you feel there is life," she said. "Here you have to create the life. And they (Americans) put their feet on the desk when the professor is giving the lecture. I feel it's disrespect – maybe they don't feel this way."

Al-Rawi said she would like students to give her more feedback during the semester instead of waiting until formal evaluations to share their comments.

"It's by the end – you don't learn from them, they don't learn from you," she said. "I'd like to see the student come and say, 'hey.' We are in a relation that is the passing of information, a flow of information from the professor to the student.

"We aren't sitting in a war zone – we have to help each other reach our goal. I need to improve my teaching, and they want to get the knowledge from me."

Al-Rawi said her quest for knowledge is based in her values.

"It's not the amount of money I have or the position I have. It's the knowledge that I can give, that I can learn and give, that has a value for everyone."

FAMILY

Al-Rawi and her husband, Hassan, live with their youngest child, Asma, in Manhattan. They have two other children.

Her oldest daughter, Duaa, was in sixth grade when the family came to Kansas. Now, at age 20, she is a second-year graduate student at Massachusetts Institute for Technology.

Ali, Al-Rawi's only son, was a fifth-grader in 1993, and is now a first-year graduate student at MIT. He is 19.

Asma, who Al-Rawi jokingly called the only American in the house, is a 16-year-old sophomore at K-State. She was the only child born in the United States and was in kindergarten when her family came to Kansas.

"I gained a lot – you can see. In 10 years, we built a mountain. So you can see the life of a Muslim woman – it's a jihad, it's a struggle – this is my jihad," she said. "So look at my jihad – it's a beautiful word, because you put all your effort, all your internal force, internal potential into it. Now you see what a Muslim woman can do."

Al-Rawi said that when she comes home from work, her family takes priority over her own needs.

"I forget who I am, that I have priority to myself. If I need shoes and the kids need shoes, I buy for the kids and leave myself. That's definitely the case," she said. "My happiness is connected to my family's happiness – if they are happy, then I'm happy."

Al-Rawi said that because Islam is not a religion of blind faith, but a way of determining through reason what a person does and doesn't believe, her children had a choice in whether to be Muslim.

"We discussed a lot of things. I want them to appreciate what they have. I mean, it's not just 'OK – you were raised a Muslim, you have to be a Muslim – No.' she said, accenting the last word. 'That is not Islam.

"Islam encourages a scientific way of looking at the religion. So you take the kids and show them everything around them, and let them choose." All three children did choose to follow Islam.

Al-Rawi hasn't been able to go back to Iraq since she left in 1986. She said that because she does not have a re-entry visa to the United States, she was unable to visit her homeland when her father and her mother died.

"I lost my parents while I'm here, and couldn't go and see them – some people know how painful that is. I am the youngest in the family and my mom wanted to see me, but I was, at that time, a student, and couldn't go see her. It's a nightmare that I see most of my nights, because I couldn't go. It was between my kids and my mom."

Al-Rawi said she chose to stay so her children could get the best education possible.

The rest of her extended family is still in Iraq, and she said she misses them and worries more about them now than before the war in Iraq began. However, she said she and her family keep themselves busy in order to cope with the worry.

SOCIAL

Al-Rawi said her social life is affected both by her Muslim beliefs and by her status as a foreigner.

The periwinkle blue hair cover she wears is clasped at her neck with a flower-like broach. She touches it as she explains that wearing it gives her more freedom, not less.

"I can sit in front of anyone and talk. I don't want men to look at me as a woman. Look at me as a physicist or a mother. Look at me and see that I am human like you, not different than you. Inside, this gives me freedom," she said.

"All of the woman's body is attractive. Hair is an important part of how a woman looks – the hair adds a romantic look."

Along with this idea, Al-Rawi said she believes by wearing revealing clothing, women sexually harass men.

"To me, it's also sexual harassment when a girl shows all of her body in front of her colleague," she said. "It's like putting food in front of a bear and saying, 'no, don't touch it.' It bothers men. We are in education – wear a decent shirt. It's just disgusting."

Al-Rawi said it's difficult for Arabs and some Muslims to speak out about their experiences in America, because many are worried about the repercussions of what they say.

"They are worried that maybe if they leave the country, the United States will ignore their visa, or they can not finish their study," she said. "They don't want to get in trouble. For us, as a foreigner, it can be put under a different category."

ISLAM

Al-Rawi's religion touches every aspect of her life. She said Islam organizes her thoughts into what is right and wrong.

"It controls my desire," she said matter-of-factly. "I'm not going to drink – it's against my religion. I cannot go out with a man – I will think about my religion. I cannot have lengthy conversations with a man that is not my husband. I can talk with him about science, but that's it – it (my religion) says, 'that's your limit – hey, stop.'"

A Muslim prays five times a day: before sunrise, around noon, around 4 p.m., after the sun sets and at night, around 10:30.

"I pray in the office – I have my rug and stand up and pray wherever I am. Sometimes the students come in and talk to me while I'm praying – and it's funny," she said, trying to control her laughter. "I should be concentrating, but it's such an innocent event to me. I don't mind."

Al-Rawi unrolled a small red rug with intricate designs on it. She said she uses the rug because she knows it's clean – no one has stepped on it with shoes on.

When she prays in her office, Al-Rawi faces to the northeast, in the direction of Mecca, the place of worship.

"The main idea is not toward a particular direction, the main idea is unity of the human being. So we stand up and pray at the same time, and we have one single direction to pray," she said. "We are all human beings – if you are rich and I am poor, if I am ugly and you are beautiful, if you are blonde and I am black – we are all the same.

"The message is, we are all human and then there is God on the top."

Al-Rawi said that because in Islam, all humans are considered to be equal, rejecting people according to their appearance or beliefs is unacceptable to Muslims.

"If people want to understand the Muslim – we are not jealous of the American. We admire the knowledge, science and technology. We like the opportunity. We don't have the hatred in our hearts, but when you treat me different than you treat other people, the rejection could be really – I mean, I don't like it. Nobody likes it."

However, Al-Rawi said she feels like she is perceived differently every day.

"To fill out a form and write you are white and not American, or black – it's disgusting," she said. "I know that it can be useful, but it still hurts."

"I mean, it makes me feel, 'Oh I'm classified in a different category,' but we don't want to be. We are human, your genes and my genes are the same," she said and clasped her hands together, "and if we bring in another black person – also the same.

"And we have the same blood. We can transfer blood from one person to another. We can marry a person of another..." Her voice trailed off as she shook her head and looked away. "All these things sound strange to me."

TO THE POINT

ARH proposal fails to focus on students' needs

The Association of Residence Halls' proposed rate increase of 7 percent fails to make sense.

Of all the Kansas regents schools, K-State is seeing the biggest increase.

What is yet to be known: From where did the Association of Residence Halls gather information that suggested such an increase?

There are too many instances at this university when students are not sought out for input regarding changes that will greatly affect them. Tuition is one. The proposed hotel is another. And now comes an increase in residence hall fees.

There might be students in the association, but students at large have no idea what they are discussing. It is up to students involved with the Residence Hall Association to effectively communicate with their peers regarding any increase in fees.

State and national trends are nice to have available when addressing needs on our campus, but they should be used only as data – not a go-ahead to make changes.

More focus needs to be on local research and the specific needs of students at K-State.

When the pocketbook is threatened, it should be common sense: find out what the students think.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

THURSDAY'S OPINIONS

GRANT REICHERT

Grant Reichert offers some strange alternatives to Thanksgiving turkey, but only to keep PETA off his back.

Believe it or not

Media myths need to be debunked

CHRISTOPHER HARROP

It can be said that the job of the news media is to provide accurate and unbiased reports to the public in a timely matter.

Too bad we don't necessarily want that.

Water cooler talk never gravitates toward accurate and unbiased stories, but rather unconfirmed, untrue rumors perpetuated by a variety of sources. While most are harmless and innocent, some require closer looks to take definitive stances.

MYTH #1: HILLARY CLINTON FOR PRESIDENT 2004

It will not happen, people. Bring me the heads of every last pollster who includes Clinton in their polling data, forcing TV pundits and smarmy news anchors to make cutesy "could it happen?" comments on the air.

On every occasion that the question of running for president has been posed to her, Clinton has said she will not run.

Most talking heads reason that people are dissatisfied with the current crop of Democratic presidential candidates. Unfortunately, those talking heads do not realize the average American voter still cannot tell the difference between the candidates.

Only after the primaries do people really start caring about the issues. All we have is a personality/popularity contest being waged in the media, seeing which candidate can get the most air time.

The problem, as one Clinton adviser told Newsweek, is the media finds the story too interesting to give up on. Well, they need to let it die.

MYTH #2: THE SADDAM HUSSEIN AND AL-QAEDA LINK

If you asked me during the past two years whether I believed Iraq had ties to al-Qaeda, I almost immediately would reply with a resounding "No, you fool!"

Well, a 16-page memo written by Undersecretary of Defense Douglas Feith has not yet prompted me to commit an act of contrition for that belief, but it certainly is forcing me to question my belief.

The memo, sent to the Senate Intelligence Committee, contains 50 points suggesting ties between al-Qaeda and Iraq from 1990 to the eve of the war in Iraq in March 2003. The points rely heavily on CIA reports that predate the Bush administration.

Did the massive outpouring of dissent against Operation Iraqi Freedom blind us to what had been heavily hinted at by the major news media in the months preceding the launching of the war?

Possibly, but I am unwilling to condemn the public for not recognizing one truth out of a plethora of lies spewed by the Bush administration, assuming the claims in Feith's memo are correct.

MYTH #3: ROY MOORE WAS RIGHT

Sure, this is a value judgment rather than a prominent news item, but it embodies the sentiment that much of the media has taken to the embattled former Chief Justice of the Alabama Supreme Court.

Moore, removed from the bench for his refusal to comply with a higher court order concerning the Ten Commandments monument on courthouse grounds, is still being lauded and praised.

Moore now is the martyr of the American legal system. He has enough support to propel him into higher office. He remains the darling of the Fox News crowd.

That does not make him right.

Moore deserved to be removed from office. He also deserves to be slapped in the face with the Constitution and the majority opinion from Engel v. Vitale. A physical lesson in constitutional law might be the only way he will ever understand the establishment clause of the First Amendment.

Moore consistently has proven he is neither concerned with the rule of law or the rule of man, but rather the rule of idiocy.

Whatever the lure of these and similar stories is, avoid buying into the unmitigated brouhaha that they generate. Rumors do not belong in professional journalism unless there is some truthful news element to it. Analyzing each story is necessary, and readers should take that step to debunk myths as well as the organizations that wish to print them.

Financial pressures persist despite income sources

The piercing scream of an alarm clock lifts Angie's eyelids. Groggily, she sits up and places her head in her hands. Sighing, she contemplates the stressful day awaiting her.

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

She has five hours of class, a quick lunch break, two hours to work on a group project and then a mad rush to prepare for six hours of work.

Angie casts a sorrowful glance at the bed she will not see for another 17 hours. Bemoaning her lot in life as a working student, Angie envisions her affluent friends peacefully slumbering the day away.

At 4 p.m. Angie dons her work uniform and prepares to put on a smile for the multitude of customers she will face tonight. Contemplating the lack of money she has for her cell phone bill, Angie wishes her parents sent checks in the mail.

Across town, Ryan awakes with a start and angrily slams the button on his buzzing alarm clock. With a pounding heart, he jumps out of bed and prepares for the school day.

Ryan can't afford to be late to his first class. He needs his full participation points every day to bring his grade up from a B+ to an A. With his parents footing the bill for his college education, Ryan is obligated to meet their requirements for success.

Ryan shakes his head in consternation as he envisions a day filled with studying followed by a phone call from his parents. Ryan jealously envisions his friends who don't have to explain their every move to their parents.

At 5 p.m. Ryan's phone rings. Drawing a deep breath, he mentally prepares himself to convince his parents that school is fine and his GPA will rise.

Students who have to worry about making their bills as well as grades have it rough. They have to budget carefully and add a job to an already full stress load. With this balancing act, independent students might regard students supported by their parents with disdain.

However, students whose bills are paid by their parents have responsibilities and pressure, too. They also are required to budget and manage pressure.

When self-supported students waste their money on obtuse activities, they have no one to answer to but themselves and perhaps bill collectors, depending on how frequent their wasteful spending is.

A parent-supported student will have to answer to Mom or Dad for useless spending. When they need more money, instead of asking a boss for more hours at work, they are required to beseech their parents with an explanation of what it will be used for and what happened to the allotted allowance.

Parents who don't pay for their children's education still care about their success. Their opinions and advice are sought and their admonitions can be strong, but if their child fails a class, they are not watching their money go down the drain.

Therefore, the pressure of an independent student to call home and report is not as acute as that of a student who needs to report progress. A parent-supported student usually is required to report on the status of his or her parent's money that is being poured into his or her education.

For students on financial aid or scholarships, this process of maintaining a success rate is familiar. People want to know their money is not being wasted.

If it is your own money, the internal pressure to succeed and pay your own bills may seem overwhelming.

Still, when resenting the students who seemingly have it easy, remember – pressure can come from many sources.

Housing and Dining Services proposes increase in rates

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's tuition is increasing, and so are fees for K-State's residence halls.

The Department of Housing and Dining Services has proposed a 7-percent increase for a double room – from $4,800 to $5,136 per school year. Proposed rates would be effective as early as May.

Bob Burgess, associate director of administrative services for the department, said the annual rate has increased for about the past 15 years.

"Last year the increase was 7 percent, as well. It's been for the last couple years a standard increase," he said. "Part of that has been toward renovation of residence halls – upkeep and modernization. It hasn't all been cost -of-living increases. We are looking at a portion of the increase going toward plans to continue to modernize residence halls and dining facilities – projects ARH has been actively involved in targeting and identifying."

Rate increases also are based on increases in cost of materials, wages and benefits, he said.

Burgess said Housing and Dining Services receives no state funding. They are solely funded by room and board.

To set rates, Burgess said the department works with members of the Association of Residence Halls.

Michael Pule, president of ARH, said administrators typically present what they feel is needed as an increase to maintain housing and dining services.

"They present that to our general body which consists of 23 voting representatives from the residence halls and eight executives," he said. "We have the opportunity to come back with a suggestion to either go ahead with what they proposed, or we can say we don't want to give that much of an increase."

Pule said he thinks the proposed increase is acceptable.

"We actually approved more than what they were asking for to upgrade other projects they weren't really focusing on," he said. "We approved a bigger increase to do other things. We're going to try to speed up projects with the extra money we approved."

Specific improvements will most likely be decided on next semester, Pule said.

Burgess said the increase may affect the retention rate.

"It may not have an effect on incoming students, but it may have a slight effect on the retention of students," he said. "A number of factors play into retention, and cost is one of those. Cost certainly can be a factor in any decision people make."

When compared to the other Board of Regents institutions, K-State's increases are the highest. The University of Kansas proposed the smallest increase – 3.1 percent. Although KU's increase is less, K-State's proposed rate remains lower than KU's proposed rate by $12.

"Each institution has an agenda for what they are hoping to accomplish, and the monetary resources they need to accomplish that are completely different," he said. "If you look over the course of years, we traditionally have not been the highest. It all depends on projects going on and what they hope to accomplish."

The rates will be proposed at today's Board of Regents' meeting. Burgess said rates won't be voted on until the December meeting.

Troopers seek witnesses to fatal accident

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Highway Patrol is seeking help in locating a vehicle officials believe caused the accident Friday evening that killed one K-State student.

Trooper Mario Rios said he does not have a description of the vehicle that forced Evan Riordan, junior in pre-pharmacy, onto the right shoulder of U.S. Highway 77.

With many students traveling north for the football game Friday, Rios said he is hopeful someone was witness to the vehicle crossing the center line. The vehicle would have been seen traveling south between 7:15 and 7:45 p.m. Friday.

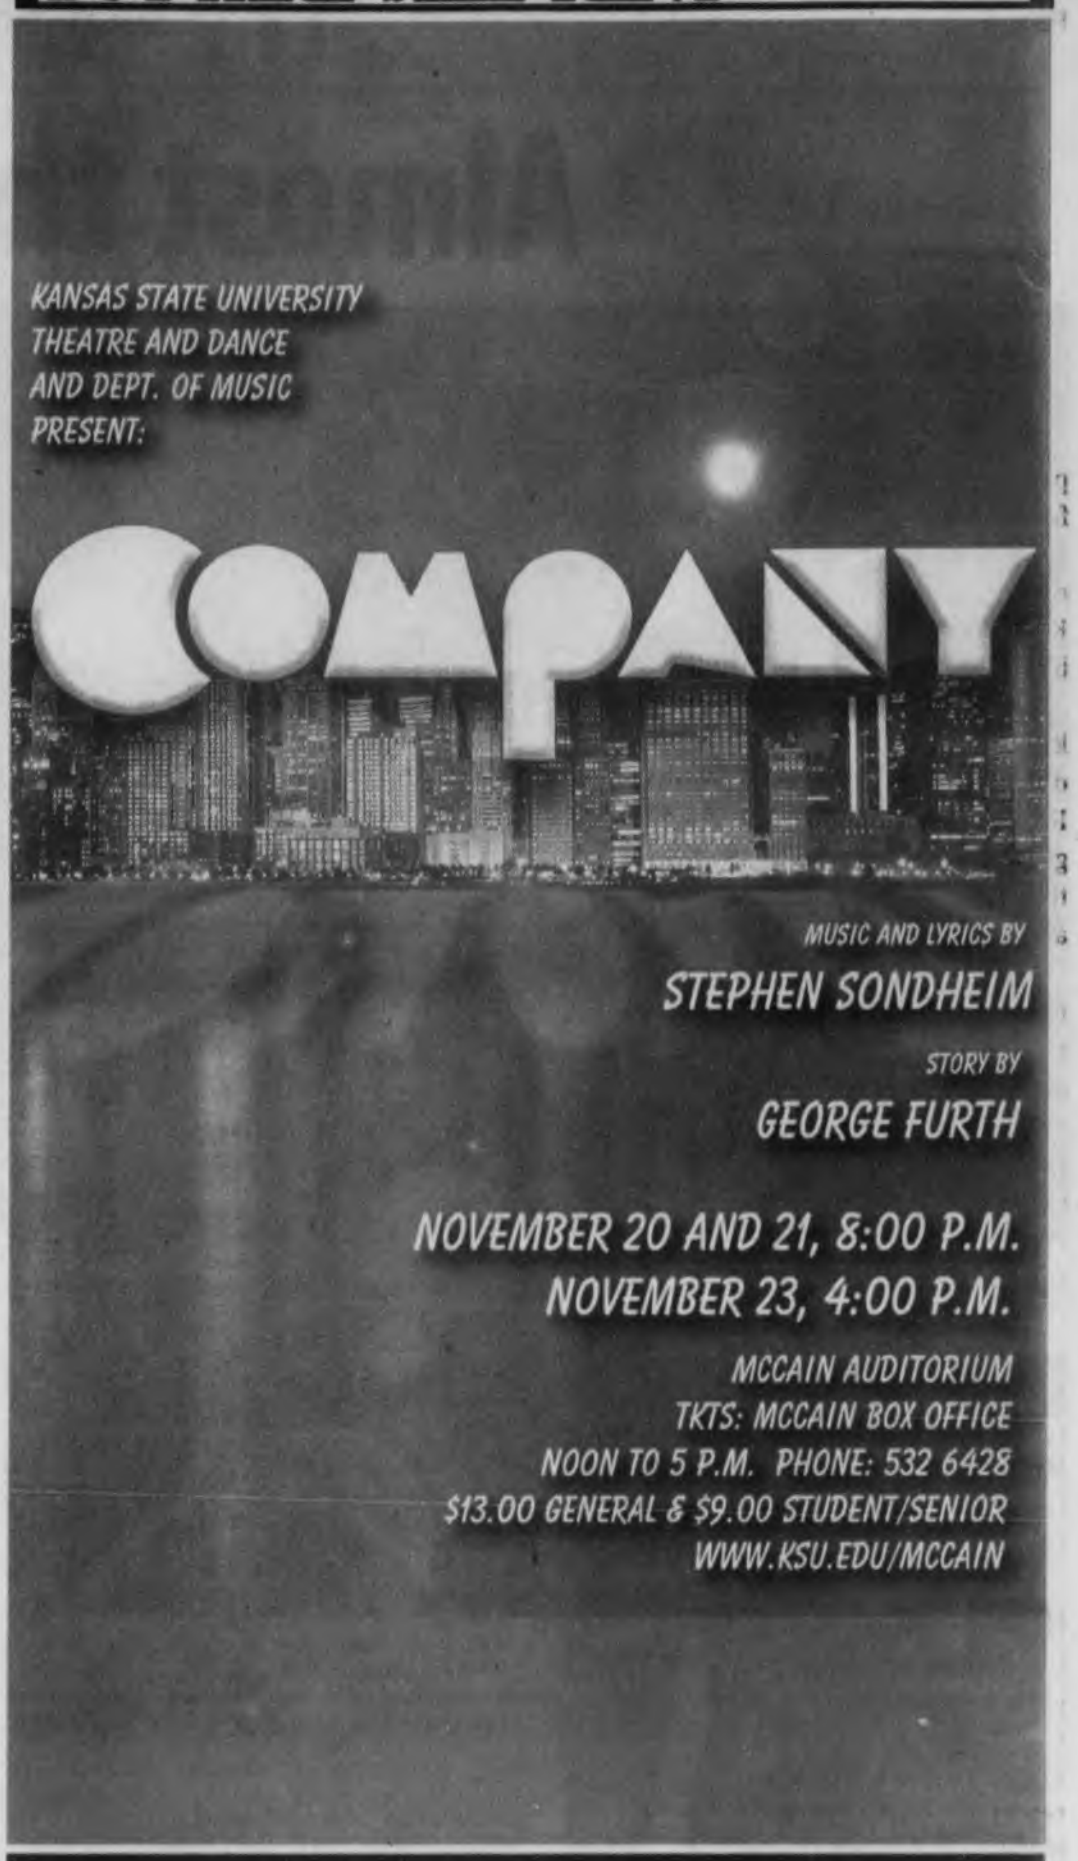
"There were a lot of students heading up north on that night, so hopefully we have someone to give us more details," Rios said.

The accident occurred near Randolph, Kan., at 7:30 p.m. Friday. Riordan was driving north when he went off the right shoulder to avoid a car crossing the center line. He overcorrected, hitting a car traveling south, driven by Jeffrey Tryon of Waterville, Kan. Tryon, who was not wearing a seatbelt, was killed instantly.

Riordan's car then went airborne, landing on top of a vehicle driven by Donna Logback of Manhattan.

Kevin Armstrong, junior in economics, was a passenger in Riordan's car and was killed instantly. Also injured were Riordan; Mollie Delph, sophomore in pre-health; and Eric Lovig, junior in biology. All four students were wearing seatbelts.

An advertisement will run all week in the Collegian and the Manhattan Mercury asking for witnesses to come forward.



"We didn't get enough witnesses on the scene, and the driver said someone swerved in his lane and that's what caused the accident," Rios said.

Rios said there have been reports of a car forcing people off the road as far north as Marshall County. There is no evidence to determine if the driver of the vehicle was intentionally crossing the center line, he said.

"There were other people that have stated that the vehicle ran them off the road, also," he said.

— Anyone with information about the vehicle should contact the Kansas Highway Patrol dispatch at (785) 827-4437.

Cats need 2 victories to clinch Big 12 title

Coach Suzie Fritz has said it all year – that her team's maturity has been the guiding force to its success this season.

That philosophy hasn't changed.

Coming off of a resounding 3-1 win over Nebraska on Saturday, Fritz and the fifth-ranked Cats (25-3, 15-1) hit the road to face Oklahoma (11-17, 3-13) at 7 tonight in McCasland Field House.

Fritz said she didn't know how her team would handle the victory once they got back to practice.

"We had a really nice day and that's what you wonder on Sundays – how you're going to respond to a big win or loss," Fritz said. "When Monday rolled around and we got into practice, they were over it."

That maturity, Fritz said, helped K-State remain focused despite its emotional win over the Huskers.

"Again, experience, maturity – understanding that if you really want to accomplish these things, these are the things you're talking about – competing nationally, winning Big 12 titles, then you've got to be able to put those things behind you and move forward," Fritz said. "We can't overlook teams like Oklahoma and Texas Tech, and that's who we've got this week."

With the win over Nebraska, the Cats need to win two of their last four matches to clinch their first Big 12 title.

If they win out, Fritz said, K-State should find itself in contention for a No. 1 seed in the NCAA Tournament.

"If we can win out, win our conference, we ought to be one of two or three teams they consider for that last number one seed," she said.

When Fritz came to K-State seven years ago, she found herself in a perennial top-30 program led by then-coach Jim McLaughlin. Success this season, she said, has been a building process since her arrival.

"You don't all of a sudden wake up one day and your team's good," Fritz said. "This is something that we've been building since I got here seven years ago."

That process, Fritz added, is something that took a while before her team exploded onto the national scene this year.

"It takes a long time to build a team to be able to make that jump," Fritz said. "We were 30-something when I got here, and to make that jump even into the top 20 is a big deal. Then, to make that jump into the top 10 is a really big deal, and now to make that jump even further, that takes time."

Not only does it take time, other factors were involved in K-State's recent success.

"It takes time, it takes a lot of hard work, it takes a tremendous amount of people doing the right thing at the same time, and I think there's just pieces that have come together this year," Fritz said.

All things considered, Fritz once again gave credit to her group of seniors, saying they have more to do with the wins than anything else.

"It's been invaluable," she said of the contributions of her seniors. "It's the reason we're having the success we've been having. It has far more to do with them and their composure than it does with anything I'm doing."

Fritz called the group the best recruiting class she's had in her tenure at K-State.

"They are truly the most unbelievable group I've ever coached," Fritz said. "This is the best recruiting class we've ever had, and from top to bottom their character, their work ethic, their commitment to K-State, their loyalty – they are as good as it gets."

Fans find additional thrills by playing fantasy sports games

Two years ago, I was at the top of my game. Then college set in, and I had to take a break from the sport I love.

But now I'm back.

The game? Fantasy sports, baby.

WES MARFIELD

Back in the day, I used to be the king of fantasy sports. In high school, my buddies and I spent the majority of my senior year setting up leagues and planning live drafts. Who needs class when you could spend hours searching Yahoo! Sports for that elusive backup third baseman?

With college taking my fantasy time, I had to retire until I decided to sign up for an NBA league a few weeks ago.

If you've never participated in a fantasy league, you have no right to call yourself a true sports fan. And if you've never had a live draft, you're missing out.

Nothing beats six to 12 guys sitting in a room berating each other for three hours as they stressfully try to fill a roster with the best of the best.

Take, for instance, my first fantasy basketball draft back in the fall of 2001. The first two rounds went relatively smoothly. Someone took Alonzo Mourning at the end of round two, the first questionable pick of the night.

After several kidney jokes, we were back at it. When Wally Szczerbiak was taken out of nowhere, that's when the real fun began.

The guy who drafted him claimed he was poised for a breakout season. We didn't care, and to this day he still gets made fun of for it.

I won that league, maintaining the title of fantasy king until baseball season rolled along.

Pumped for a chance to knock me off of my throne, the others in our league couldn't wait until the next live draft.

Looking back, we probably shouldn't have allowed our rosters to hold 30 players.

That's right, our draft went 30 rounds. Three weeks after it started, the draft finally concluded.

Honestly, I don't even remember this draft. So much trash was talked that excruciating night, I honestly found myself shaking when I was on the clock.

This probably best explains why I took Scott Rolen in the third round.

At the time, it sounded like a good idea – solid defensively while putting up decent offensive numbers in a tough fantasy position.

K-State guards against letdown

Some people call it a virus.

Others call it a disease.

Whatever it is, K-State will be guarding against the dreaded let-down Saturday when the Wildcats face Missouri in a 6 p.m. kickoff at KSU Stadium.

Coming off what quarterback Ell Roberson called the most significant win in program history – the first time the Wildcats had won in Lincoln since 1968 – plenty is on the line Saturday against Missouri.

Being prepared for the Tigers is at the forefront of Coach Bill Snyder's mind.

"You'd always give some thought to it," Snyder said of being defeated, "but I'd like to think these youngsters have been through enough on both sides of the ledger that they understand what can happen in that respect."

Last season, the Wildcats beat a highly-regarded USC team but followed the win with a loss to Colorado on the road. A blowout win over Oklahoma State was followed by another loss at home to Texas.

But this season is different in many ways.

K-State has rebounded from three losses to position itself for a Big 12 North championship.

"They understand what's at stake," Snyder said of his team. "It kind of depends on what your approach is as much as anything."

Beyond simply the Nebraska win, K-State must guard against emotions. Senior Day and the final game of several of the Wildcats' most prolific players will create even more tension.

THE ENTERTAINER

Cornerback Cedrick Williams has become a lockdown cornerback to complement senior Randy Jordan.

The junior college transfer from Garden City (Kan.) Community College opened eyes when he assumed Thorpe Award-winner Terence Newman's No. 4 jersey.

Snyder remarked he had made more progress in as little time as anyone to come through the program.

"It was kind of an eye-opening experience for him," Snyder said. "It took awhile, but all of a sudden he got a feel for the tempo of the game. When he finally realized it, he took off."

NO DOAK

Running back Darren Sproles, the nation's third-leading rusher, was left off the list of finalists for the Doak Walker Award, given annually to the nation's leading rusher.

At that, Snyder was a bit miffed.

"I don't know," he said. "I don't know what goes into making those kinds of decisions. My guess is they look at the numbers and that's it."

But the numbers stack up well for the junior. He leads the nation with 6.3 yards per carry and the two players with more yardage than Sproles also have at least 56 more carries.

BALL STATE? WHAT?

Tight end Thomas Hill was injured in fall drills and missed most of the season.

Still, the senior refused to pursue a medical red-shirt, and will finish his career with his class on Saturday.

When asked how close he was to a red-shirt, he responded, "Close as Ball State would be to beating us."

The 2002 All-Big 12 tight end said he doesn't regret his decision to play this season, mainly in a backup role to now-starting tight end Brian Casey.

"I knew I could get back, and that's what I did," he said.

Barry Bonds won a record sixth National League MVP award Tuesday, becoming the first player to capture the honor for three consecutive years.

Bonds

His thoughts immediately turned to Bobby Bonds, his three-time All-Star father who died in August.

"He has been my hitting coach my entire life, ever since I was a little kid. I miss him dearly. It's a really emotional time for me right now."

And a controversial time, too.
